ARCHITECTURE
Francisca Villarroel Alonso grew up in a family of architects, first in Santiago, Chile, and later in Marbella, Spain. This background gave her a broad foundation when she moved to Washington, DC, to study architecture. “Design has always been part of my life,” she says. “The fact that I have traveled all over the world gives me a compassionate understanding of people’s needs and helps me come up with innovative design solutions to improve their lives at home.”

Today, she and her husband, architect Antonio Alonso, work together in their full-service architecture and custom-building firm. They put clients’ needs first, as Villarroel Alonso explains: “Our focus has always been to help our clients bring their vision to reality. We spend time with clients and talk over many options and design solutions and use an extensive questionnaire to truly understand their needs. Once we understand what they are all about, it’s easy to come up with a style, color palette and look they will love.”

The Alonsos recently completed a showcase project in McLean, Virginia, dubbed the 360 Home. “This custom project embodies everything we have learned from past clients as to how they want to live and how they want their home to enrich their everyday lives,” says Villarroel Alonso. “We find inspiration in helping people live happier at home.”
A grotto, an outdoor gallery with travertine floors and an open courtyard (top) connect the 360 Home to the landscape. The master bath (below) features a soaking tub and Crema Marfil marble on the floors and walls. The front façade of the McLean, Virginia, home (right) was designed to make its owners feel like they are on vacation all year round.

BALLARD + MENSUA ARCHITECTURE

Seth Ballard of Ballard + Mensua Architecture espouses the philosophy that an architect is a kind of custom tailor. “We enjoy the challenge of finding a style and design that best fits each unique client,” Ballard says. “To achieve this perfect fit requires involved clients who openly share their ideas. We work collaboratively with clients to make their dreams a reality.”

Ballard and his associates listen to clients and are careful not to impose their own design theology. The firm’s creative process involves extra time spent on cost studies, which helps clients feel more in control of their budgets. “We develop a master plan that incorporates all work that a client may ever want to do,” Ballard explains. “There’s a detailed cost analysis, with partial drawings and extra time spent obtaining competitive bids, all before we select our builder. So our clients get the benefit of design/build with the checks and balances that a separate architect and builder offer.”

Ballard + Mensua was featured in the inaugural issue of New American Luxury magazine and recently won a Super Service Award from Angie’s List. The firm’s work will shortly be included in a new book, Leeding the Way, focusing on green design.
A renovated Georgetown row house features a clean-lined, modern master bath (opposite, top) and a bright, airy kitchen (opposite, bottom). A lakefront home in West Virginia was tucked between trees to keep the site natural (above); included in a new book, Leading the Way, the home features geothermal heating and cooling, insulated concrete-form walls and well and solar hot water. A whole-house renovation of a suburban rambler (left) added both a second story and a front porch.
Partners for 25 years, Anthony “Ankie” Barnes and Stephen J. Vanze of Barnes Vanze Architects build houses for today’s lifestyles that are high-performance, modern classics, inspired by the clients’ needs, dreams and site. Their finished projects not only reflect their clients’ tastes and values, they are also architecturally fluent and compatible with their settings.

At Barnes Vanze, communication is key to a successful design process, and the firm puts a premium on trust, inspiration, openness and service. “Our firm is not selling a point of view, except that good design, regardless of style, is important,” Barnes observes. The firm brings together all team members, including contractors, interior designers and/or landscape architects, early in the design process; according to the principals, this contributes to the ultimate success of any project.

Barnes’s personal history has informed his ability as an architect. “I come from a big family that experienced some tragedy, which taught me to listen well and navigate different situations,” he explains. “Being an immigrant opened my ears and eyes to American culture and brought other traditions to the table, and being educated both here and abroad solidified my foundation.”

Anthony Barnes was the winner of Home & Design’s 2013 Designers’ Choice Award for Hall of Fame Architect. In 2011, the firm was a winner of a Builder’s Choice Design and Planning Award, while Stephen Vanze received an award for Architecture in the Public Interest from the Washington Architectural Foundation.
Inspired by a “love of beautiful things,” Scarlett Breeding studied fine art and interior design as an undergraduate. Later, finding those fields limiting, she decided to earn a degree in architecture.

This background has given Breeding a refined understanding of how to create spaces that are artful and responsive to how people live and work as families. “My years as a textile artist taught me the value of variety in the palette of exterior and interior materials, of how architecture and furnishings complement each other—and the special beauty that is achievable in weaving them together,” she says.

Breeding enjoys meeting clients’ needs, budgets and aesthetic aspirations in a way that satisfies their dreams. “I search for the soul in every client—places of their fondest memories, how they want to spend their day,” she says. “I try to listen so hard I can actually hear what they want to see.

“I truly love the people, the challenges and the making of every project,” she continues. “And I love the process of working with the builder and owner during construction, making everything actually better as each challenge arises.”

Her firm, Alt Breeding Schwarz, recently launched a Kitchen and Custom Casework Division, which won two awards in 2014.

Splendid al fresco designs include a seating area at the edge of an outdoor garden room (above); a garden terrace linking a carriage house with the main house (below); and custom entry gates that lead to a walled garden (opposite).
This rambling Shingle-style home on Aberdeen Creek near Annapolis is a testament to Scarlett Breeding’s care and attention to detail.
Garden entrance doors (above) and a terrace for entertaining overlooking a woodland garden (below) grace this Washington, DC, home (right), where a lower terrace features a Diamond Spa hot tub.
A house designed by Carter + Burton reflects the careful process of blending site, client’s program, technical innovation and artistry with regional materials and construction methods. Page Carter and Jim Burton have been passionate about integrating sustainable design techniques into their work since they became partners over fifteen years ago. Their projects incorporate passive solar techniques, energy efficiency, natural daylighting and eco-friendly building materials. They care deeply about connecting a house and interior spaces to a site and they work to make those spaces comfortable and inspiring.

Both Carter and Burton have refined an engaging and enjoyable design process that ensures their clients’ needs are met. “We are problem solvers who enjoy design and thrive on working with people,” says Carter. “We are committed to creating sustainable, well-designed work within a wide range of budgets; our focus is on quality, craftsmanship, energy efficiency and innovation. We promote passive solar techniques, eco-friendly building materials and a strong connection to site and place.”

Carter + Burton’s extensive portfolio includes new construction, renovations, residential, commercial, institutional and interior design projects. The firm has garnered many awards and its work has been published around the world. Its Yoga Studio project received the first LEED for Homes Gold rating in the Southeast United States.
Pictured here, the Elk Run Ridge residence was developed by Carter + Burton as a livable gallery for the owners, a folk art dealer and a music teacher. Clockwise from opposite, top: A “core” at the center of the house is wrapped in a walnut basket weave, visible in a corridor bordered by stone. Impeccably crafted stone, wood, metal and concrete highlight the main entry. An open floor plan offers ample natural light and unbroken views. The home appears elongated, with a unified roof, dog trot breezeway and wrap-around porch connecting public and private spaces.
Lorena Checa, AIA, LEED AP

CHECA ARCHITECTS, PC

Lorena Checa traces her interest in architecture back to her native Peru and a visit she and her father made to an architect—as clients—when she was 10 years old. “Imagining our finished home ignited my desire to be an architect,” she recalls. Checa later studied architecture at Catholic University and launched her own firm in 1992.

Growing up in Peru, Checa forged a deep connection to nature that informs her work and its focus on sustainable design. “I was fortunate to live in Lima at a time when it was known as ‘The City of Gardens,’” she explains. “I spent lots of time in homes that were integrated with gardens and daylight. And I spent summers on the family farm, where I gained a profound sensitivity to nature and ecological balance. Later, living abroad in Europe further refined my respect for architectural styles and their history.”

Today, Checa works closely with clients to integrate sustainable architecture and simple, elegant interior design into their projects. “We focus on creating harmonious spaces that celebrate the natural beauty of the surroundings and lift the human spirit,” she says.

In 2003, Checa was awarded the Presidential Citation for Sustainable Design by the D.C. chapter of the American Institute of Architects. Her work has appeared in Home & Design, Green Building & Design, Architecture DC and The Washington Post.

Checa Architects integrated indoor and outdoor environments in a whole-house renovation and addition in Arlington, Virginia. Sunrise is enjoyed from the front porch (opposite). Daylight fills the new kitchen, dining, and family room addition (below). Elevated decks and large windows in the rear (above) open to sunsets and majestic skies.
Checa Architects reimagined a 1970s contemporary home in McLean (above). Large windows and various curved decks are open and connect the home to the site. A floating gazebo (opposite) sits lightly on the sloping landscape. A new guesthouse in Great Falls (right) was sited with minimal impact to the wooded lot. The reading alcove provides a cozy perch from the loft.
Purple Cherry Architects specializes in luxury homes featuring elegant architectural detail and beautiful spaces that excite and reflect the client. Principal Cathy Purple Cherry brings 25 years of experience to her work; her firm aspires to a level of beauty in the homes it designs through views, details and planning strategies that are awe-inspiring. The firm’s designers are talented, visionary, detail-oriented and attentive.

Technology is a visual and educational tool at Purple Cherry Architects. “We encourage our clients to create virtual idea boards to help us capture their preferences and inspirations,” says Purple Cherry.

A savvy businesswoman as well as the mother of three children—including one with special needs—she has developed a strong ability to listen and guide great design. “I feel an important factor in the client-designer relationship is the designer’s ability to listen with sincerity,” she explains. She is particularly proud of projects in which “the quality of the client-architect relationship matches the quality of the house. This reflects what we strive for on every project.”

The firm also practices Purposeful Architecture, which “designs for the needs of individuals with disabilities, creating environments that lead them to independence,” says Purple Cherry. She adds, “The hallmark of a successful project is the happiness of the client and the awe of visitors!”

Anne Decker, AIA

ANNE DECKER ARCHITECTS, LLC

Anne Decker Architects, LLC, specializes in the design of well-crafted homes and additions that enhance their surroundings. Sensitivity to scale, simplicity of form and attention to detail characterize the work of this nationally recognized firm.

With over twenty years of experience creating timeless residential architecture, principal Anne Decker and her office work in close collaboration with each client to realize their vision of home. “We approach the design of each project with a focus on being good listeners, a rigorous attention to detail and a keen appreciation of the site and its unique requirements,” Decker says. “Our goal is to create places that are beautiful, comfortable and of exceptional quality.”

Anne Decker’s work has appeared in national publications, including Architectural Digest, Period Homes, New Old House and Traditional Home. The firm’s projects have also been featured in Home & Design and Bethesda Magazine. Decker received the 2009 Palladio Award and has been honored with an AIA/DC Washingtonian Award and a Residential Architect Design Award. “The quality of our work comes from our very talented team of architects and support staff,” Decker says. “Their experience, dedication to, and understanding of the building process contribute to the beauty and excellence of each project.”

Anne Decker and her team designed custom cabinetry with a clean-lined, traditional look (opposite) and juxtaposed it with more modern touches like steel windows in a kitchen addition (above). New, artificially deepened custom paneling (below) evokes the feeling of an old masonry wall.

Alan Dynerman, FAIA

DYNERMAN ARCHITECTS, PC

Alan Dynerman, FAIA, begins each project with two primary goals: understanding the site, its opportunities and limitations, and embracing his client’s agenda and intentions. “We do not cleave to specific trends—stylistic or philosophical,” says Dynerman. “Each client and site is unique. I measure the success of our work with two yardsticks: the degree to which the work is integrated into the larger whole of the site; and how well the final design reflects and serves my client’s intentions.”

Dynerman Architects’ work is exemplified by a Modernist sensibility that is not abstract or cold but textured, approachable and filled with light. This and the use of natural materials are hallmarks of the firm’s work.

Dynerman and his team listen closely to clients, developing a dialog that informs the design. The architects bring their expertise and critical thinking to the conversation; the clients bring ideas of lifestyle and interests. “We develop options that reflect the clients’ goals and requirements,” says Dynerman.

Dynerman’s work has received regional and national design awards including the National AIA Honor Award, Custom Home’s Best Project of the Year award and IIDA’s award for Best Project by a Small Firm. Construction of his design for the Georgetown University Calcagnini Contemplative Center was recently completed. The Center’s Chapel of St. Ignatius of Loyola earlier received an AIA DC design award for Unbuilt Work.

Dynerman’s dynamic contemporary design of a 24,000-square-foot Bethesda home includes a bedroom wing and screened porch (above) and an expansive poolscape in back (below). Inside, the entry hall and stair (opposite) feature a warm, organic material palette.
At poolside, a bridge leads to the screened porch (above), while the clean-lined kitchen (right) boasts floating shelves that lend a sense of openness. A combination living/dining room (opposite, top) is clad in stonework and warm wood finishes, and an exterior shot reveals the magnitude of the home (opposite, bottom), which encompasses a main house, guest house, pool and pergola.
Having worked together since they were architecture students at Catholic University, Elizabeth Emerson and Mark Lawrence share a compatible design sensibility. Now principals of E/L Studio, the partners take a similar, holistic approach to their work; over the years, they have developed hand-in-glove working methods, feeling that having two sets of eyes and ideas inevitably enriches the design.

Inspired by the conception and creation of beautiful things, E/L Studio faces every project as a unique challenge to reach an innovative and thoughtful solution. Architecture by Emerson and Lawrence is anticipatory and fosters new relationships and growth, developing strategies that are unique to the problems and potential posed in each individual project. They aspire to create architecture that is so rooted in the quality of its site that it is timeless.

Emerson and Lawrence seek clients who are receptive to new methods and ideas. They appreciate when clients seek them out after seeing completed projects with features that intrigued them. Their greatest reward is seeing a completed project that is happily and actively used as imagined. The firm recently won two Washingtonian awards for the Lincoln Street Residence and the 63rd Avenue Residence, along with an AIA award for the offices of University of Queensland.

Richard Foster | Daniela Martinez

RICHARD FOSTER ARCHITECTS

Architect Richard Foster and his associates take a distinctive approach to designing a home. They strive to convey the sense that the home evolved on the land, taking advantage of the land’s natural characteristics and the surrounding views. “The interior of each home includes strategic sight lines and carefully framed views, a clear organization of spaces with a sense of procession and elements of the unexpected for added visual interest,” explains Foster.

For example, the architect proposed a novel solution for Arlington clients concerned that their new home would be too large and out of scale for its neighborhood. “We backed away from a traditional large home and instead created a compound, or resort, of smaller scale structures,” he explains. “Each was optimized for a different purpose, but would be viewed as a harmonious enclave of ‘Tuscan’ buildings.”

No matter how large or small a project might be, Foster makes listening to his clients and understanding their goals and desires a priority. “I also hope to open their horizons to possibilities they may not have considered,” he says, adding that the hallmark of a successful project is “when the client is delighted to return home, time after time.” Foster was the architect of two of the 10 most expensive homes sold in the Washington, DC, area in 2013.
Inspired by a shared interest in artful building construction and sustainable design, founders Amy Gardner and Cherie Mohr describe their work as unwaveringly attentive to space, light, order and craft, and wholly committed to environmentally responsible building practices. Their client-centered, team approach engages the owners, engineers and contractor from concept through project completion.

Gardner Mohr feels that the key to their client-designer relationships is keeping clients central to the design process. “Once we understand how our clients live, what they value, and what comforts and inspires them, ‘style’ follows,” says Mohr. “The hallmark of a successful project is when clients feel that their needs and desires have been fully explored and appropriately met.”

Projects the firm is most proud of include a 2012 LEED Gold-certified waterfront home in Anne Arundel County; and Gardner’s stewardship of WaterShed, the house that won the US Department of Energy Solar Decathlon 2011. “We are proud of these projects because they reflect our commitment to forward-thinking environmental stewardship,” says Gardner.

Gardner Mohr Architects has received numerous honors and awards, including national AIA awards, Washingtonian Residential Design awards, AIA DC and AIA PV design awards, a LEED for Homes Gold certification and Best of Houzz recognition in both 2013 and 2014.
Cousins Thomas and Kevin Gilday were in their 20s when Tom convinced Kevin to move his home remodeling business from Upstate New York to Washington, DC. The two have always shared a passion for design and for renovations that celebrate the spirit of older homes. That shared passion has evolved over many years into a sophisticated technique that is intuitive and flexible, but leaves nothing to chance.

Today, Gilday Renovations is a green-certified design firm dedicated to a collaborative creative process that seamlessly combines the expertise of architects, interior designers, master builders and project management specialists. “When we study a project, we look at all the angles,” says Tom Gilday. “We want to be sure we fully understand the project so that our solutions will hold up over time.” Clients weigh all the options, and the firm plans for their comfort during the process “as carefully as we plan the design and construction.”

At Gilday Renovations, all projects are managed personally by one of the firm’s principals. Every client is assigned a staff architect, interior designer and project director who function as a unit, each supporting the other in delivering great ideas to the client. As Kevin Gilday explains, “we choose to work this way because it brings order to the enormous complexity of large-scale residential projects.”
Robert M. Gurney, FAIA

ROBERT M. GURNEY, FAIA, ARCHITECT

The office of Robert M. Gurney, FAIA, is dedicated to the design of modern, meticulously detailed and thoughtfully ordered residential and commercial projects that are sensitive to site, program and budget. Materials are employed with honesty, integrity and ecological awareness. Interior spaces are active and intricate, tranquil and minimal. Regardless of project size or budget, the firm is committed to producing buildings and spaces that strive for design excellence.

Whether working in complex historical districts or on a vacant site, the design process involves an understanding of site-specific issues of location, landscape, history, availability of materials and construction methods, while including considerable client interaction. Design solutions arrive through the thoughtful manipulation of light, color, texture, form and geometry, culminating in architecture that is simultaneously complex and distilled, with an awareness of location, landscape and history that is never revivalist.

The office of Robert M. Gurney, FAIA, has won more than 230 local, regional and national design awards. The firm’s work has been published in numerous local, national and international magazines, books and periodicals, and is the subject of a monograph, Modern Order: Houses by Robert Gurney.
For a Bethesda residence, Gurney created two volumes that are separated by a reflecting pool and connected by glass bridges.

Hamilton Snowber Architects designs both new homes and additions. Principals Cynthia Hamilton and Chris Snowber, along with associate Michael Rouse, emphasize respect for the existing home, but without a slavish adherence to precedent; additions should feel fresh and new while harmonizing with the existing structure.

Both Hamilton and Snowber worked in construction and historic preservation earlier in their careers. “This hands-on experience gave us an abiding respect for how buildings go together and how contractors work,” Hamilton says. “We apply this knowledge and respect on every single project.”

It also gave them insight into how to maintain an orderly and predictable design process—including budgeting. “We address the budget at the start of a project,” Snowber says. “Early communication with potential builders and careful management of a competitive bidding process reduce the possibility of surprises.” The architects listen to the client, offering sketches, drawings and computer models to ensure a full understanding of how the finished project will look and feel. During construction, the firm works to develop cooperation between owner, architect and builder.

Hamilton Snowber’s work has been recognized in The Washington Post, Home & Design and Traditional Home. A new home in Rehoboth Beach, Delaware, will soon be featured in Coastal Living.

On every project, architect Jerry Harpole strives to create balance and harmony between architectural design, interior design and his clients’ wishes. “I believe that a successful design allows a home’s interiors to become one with its architecture,” he says. “Architecture and interior design are inextricably linked.”

Harpole works closely with clients to “define the look” which reflects their lifestyle and personality while also respecting the surroundings and location of their home. He places an emphasis on functionality. “Spatial logistics and flow are essential elements to a design,” he explains.

Harpole’s interest in architecture was first sparked during his childhood, when he received a set of building blocks. He later studied architecture and design at Georgia Tech, the École de Beaux-Arts in Paris and Harvard, where he earned a master’s degree in architecture. “My experience and education provide a structure for the approach and process of each design,” he says.

Harpole supervises his projects from the design stage through construction and final installation. “I am trained to know which ideas can work and how to modify them so that they function well,” he explains. “I find creative solutions to each client’s wants and needs.”

Harrison Design is dedicated to creating luxurious custom residences that are inspired by the best of classical and modern architecture. The firm believes that a well-designed building is a work of art, an enduring investment and a place that should express the client’s individuality. “We create distinctive homes in an array of styles through the thoughtful application of traditional hierarchies, proportions, materials and detailing,” says principal Mark Hughes.

At the start of each project, the architectural design team sits down with the client and listens carefully to their vision for their project. “We develop an understanding of what will resonate with the client by asking questions and paying close attention to the answers,” explains Hughes. “Trust and respect foster an open, creative dialog between client and architect.” Harrison Design considers its work a success when a home is created that exceeds the client’s needs and expectations, during a collaborative process with allied professionals.

Founded in 1991, Harrison Design’s extensive team of architects, landscape architects and interior designers serves its clients through offices in Washington, DC, as well as in Atlanta, Beverly Hills, New York, St. Simons Island, Santa Barbara and Shanghai.

Hutchinson + Associates, LLC, is a versatile architectural firm focusing on custom-home building, residential remodeling and additions and speculative residential projects. Principal Bruce Hutchinson has been in the business for more than 30 years; his guiding principle, as he describes it, is that “every job, regardless of size, deserves smooth circulation, memorable spaces and a strong relationship between interior and exterior living areas.”

Hutchinson and his team use this philosophy to create superior, sustainable projects. They balance the needs and desires of the client with their budget, their aesthetic vision and their sustainability goals—then enhance these important elements with the architect’s expertise and experience. The firm obtains estimates prior to starting the final drawings.

Throughout his career, Hutchinson has always made time to work with each client personally. “We believe individual attention is critical to a successful project,” he says. “We strive to be excellent listeners.”

Hutchinson + Associates also emphasizes the importance of teamwork in the building process. “It takes a team of skilled professionals to make great projects,” Hutchinson explains. “We work with top engineers, builders and interior designers who have proven their excellence.”

For a Modernist architect, negotiating the historic fabric of Metropolitan Washington, DC, can be challenging. This is the case for David Jameson, who consistently uses modern constructs to create award-winning projects, frequently in traditional surroundings. The key is adapting to the individual demands of each project, he says, explaining that “the work is formed by repositioning each project’s diverse pressures into a unique situational aesthetic.”

Jameson and his studio approach new work without any preconceived notion of what it will be. According to Jameson, this approach allows the design to emerge and gives each project its own voice. “The resulting spatial logic of the work is at once experienced from both the interior and exterior of each building,” he says. “But it is always specific to the conceptual genesis of each work.” He adds, “I pursue design excellence as a spatial experience.”

Some of David Jameson’s most recent awards for residential design include the American Institute of Architects (AIA) National Honor Award for Interior Architecture; AIA National Honor Award for Small Projects; AIA National Honor Award for Interior Architecture; International Architecture Award; American Architecture Award; AIA|DC Award of Excellence; AIA|Maryland Award of Excellence; and AIA|Virginia Award of Excellence.

Educated at Princeton and Cambridge Universities in a time when geometric Modernism reigned, David Jones developed an approach that distills architecture to its purest forms. Yet he also followed a passion for history, taking every architectural history course Princeton offered.

Jones established his own practice in 1977. Since then, he and his staff have built a portfolio of homes that embrace a living past yet incorporate all of the amenities of modern life. Each project reflects attention to detail and appropriateness of form to site, neighborhood and the client’s lifestyle. “We strive to create homes that are timeless,” says Jones, “and uniquely tailored to their owners and setting.”

Jones and his colleagues are detail-driven, helping clients make the many decisions that come with designing a custom home. “We pay a great deal of attention to proportion, details and quality of workmanship, and even the smallest decisions are made with a careful eye towards the finished home,” he says.

David Jones was named top traditional architect in Home & Design’s 2012 Designers’ Choice Awards. In addition, the firm’s work has received more than 15 local and national design awards and has been published in Architectural Digest, Traditional Home and Period Homes.
Recent examples of David Jones Architects’ work include (clockwise from above) a new stone house on a hilltop in McLean; a new home in Washington, DC, with a classical entry; a renovated Queen Anne-style home in Chevy Chase, Maryland, with a charming breakfast room; and an extensive renovation of a waterfront home in St. Michaels, Maryland.
Donald Lococo, AIA

DONALD LOCOCO ARCHITECTS LLC

The team at Donald Lococo Architects serves families seeking well-considered, thoughtful homes. Informed by the client’s needs, budget constraints and dreams, a home takes form during a continuous, collaborative conversation with the homeowner.

Donald Lococo Architects is a client-focused, personal firm located in Georgetown that exclusively designs single-family homes and additions. This specialization allows the firm to remain versed in all architectural styles and historic periods.

Donald Lococo grew up in the arts, painting in oils and watercolors, and playing music: “The day I informed my teachers I was rethinking a life as a pianist and focusing on architecture it seemed like an abrupt about-face,” he recalls. Today, he sees it as a great advantage in his architecture practice and understands why architecture is often described as frozen music.

Lococo received a master’s degree in architecture from the University of Michigan. His work has been repeatedly featured in Architectural Digest, Elle Décor and House Beautiful, among other publications. He has designed homes for a U.S. president and a score of interior designers and lifestyle magazine editors. He has received Benjamin Moore’s coveted international Hue award and Southern Living’s award for Home of the Year.

Architect James McDonald has designed everything from intimate additions and starter homes to grand estates, carefully honing an understanding of the importance of balance and proportion in space. With more than 20 years of experience, McDonald’s firm has been on the forefront of new trends in residential design and construction.

James McDonald Associate Architects, PC, focuses on creating homes that are specifically designed to meet their clients’ lifestyle. “By bringing together well laid-out floor plans and intimate elevations, we create homes for today,” McDonald says. “Our knowledge of building and construction costs enables us to design homes that are affordable, unique and fresh.”

McDonald and his team include the client in the design process, listening carefully to discover their needs and wants. Each project starts with free-flowing sketches and a give-and-take creative environment. The firm explores options to arrive at a design concept that the entire team is excited about.

A winner of numerous custom builder and GALA awards, McDonald has always been fascinated by the built environment. “Nothing affects someone more than the space they live and work in,” he says. “Creating spaces that someone will enjoy and thrive in is the reward and inspiration for every project.”

McGraw Bagnoli Architects practices a collaborative design approach, believing that the best design solutions happen when creative ideas and client goals come together. Principals Adam McGraw and David Bagnoli bring more than 35 years of experience to their practice, which encompasses a range of project types from architecture to urban planning and design.

“I have always been inspired by composition, structure, art and engineering,” says McGraw. “I remember visiting the East Wing of the National Gallery as a kid and marveling over its spaces.” He adds, “Today, I am inspired by my clients. I love building unique homes for different families, figuring out how we can create the perfect space for them.”

McGraw and Bagnoli emphasize the importance of trust between architect and client. “Designers use their creative skills and clients use the hopes and dreams they have for their project,” McGraw says. “We increase our trust as we move toward the same goal of building something unique and important. The moment at the end when we all step back and realize what we have created is always a reward for that trust.”

McGraw Bagnoli Architects recently received the AIA DC Unbuilt Design Award 2013, the AIA Virginia Contextual Design Award 2013 and the AIA DC Sustainable Design Award 2013.

Mark McInturff, FAIA

McINTURFF ARCHITECTS

Mark McInturff launched McInturff Architects in 1986. Today, the firm remains intentionally small, with eight members and a bent towards highly crafted contemporary design for residential, commercial and institutional projects.

Although all of McInturff’s work is modern, he is proud of the fact that his firm has no single identifiable style, and feels he has “learned many lessons from good traditional buildings.” Each client and site is unique, and McInturff works closely with clients to tailor projects specifically to their needs and circumstances. “We are good listeners—our goal is to be hands-on and involved in the entire process,” he says. “We believe that projects are best when everything is integrated from the initial design through the finished product, including the landscape and the interiors.”

McInturff Architects has received more than 300 design awards, including 37 AIA DC/Washingtonian Residential Design Awards (more than any other firm) and three national AIA Honor Awards. The firm’s projects have been widely published both locally and nationally, and McInturff’s work has been the subject of three monographs: In Detail: McInturff Architects (2001); In Residence: McInturff Architects (2007); and In House: McInturff Architects (2013). He teaches at Catholic University and was elevated to the AIA’s College of Fellows in 2000.

Stephen Muse, FAIA | William Kirwan, AIA, LEED AP

MUSE ARCHITECTS

Stephen Muse founded Muse Architects in 1983. In 2003, longtime associate William Kirwan became a principal of the firm; today, Muse Architects is a 15-person office offering extensive experience in architecture and interior design, as well as expertise in sustainable design for all project types. “All of our projects are designed to be site- and client-specific,” Muse says. “Our practice began with additions for clients who like their houses, which led to new houses for clients who liked their neighborhoods. This led to institutional commissions in communities with an established character.” He adds, “In all cases, our approach has been to extend the best qualities of the existing context while mitigating its problems.”

Muse Architects examines the bigger picture when embarking on any project. “We carefully study the implications of the context beyond our immediate site,” Kirwan explains. At Muse Architects, new houses are judged successful only if the street and neighborhood are also improved.

Muse Architects has received more than 160 design awards, including those from the American Institute of Architects (AIA) and the National Trust for Historic Preservation. The firm’s work has appeared in more than 250 publications, including Architectural Digest, House Beautiful and Home & Design.

GTM ARCHITECTS, INC.

GTM Architects, Inc., is an award-winning, full-service firm encompassing planning, architecture and design. Established in 1989, the firm has grown and diversified over the years while maintaining its commitment to excellence in both service and design. GTM serves clients in the Washington, DC, metropolitan area and in 20 states nationwide.

With more than 40 staff members, GTM boasts a depth of design expertise in residential, commercial, retail, mixed use and recreational building types. Led by principal George T. Myers, the firm offers a collaborative environment in which, guided by a principal or partner, design teams handle a range of projects. “This team approach allows us to utilize our skill sets,” says Myers, “and to be proactive communicators appropriately managing each project.”

GTM is dedicated to enhancing the environment through sustainable design strategies; in fact, many of the staff’s designers are now accredited through the U.S. Green Building Council’s LEED accreditation program. Nationally recognized for its residential design, GTM has had its work featured in Traditional Home, Better Homes and Gardens and This Old House, and in regional publications such as The Washington Post and Home & Design.

Matthew Ossolinski, AIA, LEED AP

OSSOLINSKI ARCHITECTS

Ossolinski Architects is well regarded as a Modernist firm, yet the scope of the firm’s completed work spans a variety of styles. Since 1996, Ossolinski Architects has attracted clients with a wide-ranging approach to design and by carefully responding to their visions. In principal Matthew Ossolinski’s view, good architecture intimately reflects the needs and aspirations of each homeowner and the unique context of their particular site. This often happens in very subtle and unspoken ways.

“Our approach to design is rooted in the activity and interactions of our clients and their families. Our clients begin to understand our process through the questions we ask them and the sensitivity of the designs we produce. After they move in and experience their house, they invariably tell us we successfully keyed into their lifestyles,” says Ossolinski. “Recently, a client actually told us that she feels like her new house is her muse.”

Ossolinski Architects emphasizes a strongly collaborative approach among all parties. Contractors and engineers are integrated early so that costs and sustainable construction techniques can be developed in unison. This approach facilitates smooth project management, client engagement and creative results.
Rui Ponte and Bradley Mellor have always loved building and assembling objects. Ponte, a cycling buff, builds and tunes his own bikes. And Mellor, an automobile enthusiast, restores vintage Italian cars. So it is only fitting that in their work as principals of Ponte Mellor Architects, they both place a premium on quality craftsmanship and strive to find creative solutions to every design challenge.

“Home design is the process of generating functional solutions to often intangible ideas,” Mellor explains. “We encourage free thinking to create unique solutions.”

The architects go to great lengths to understand their clients’ vision and synthesize it into an architectural plan. “We form close relationships with our clients,” says Ponte. “Our goal is that every completed house feels like an extension of their lifestyle.”

Raised in Portugal, Ponte was influenced by European architecture and building methods. Mellor has extensive experience working in entertainment and hospitality design as well as the process of project delivery. Both architects work with clients through program and budget adjustments to make the process seamless and enjoyable. “We take personal responsibility for the quality of our work,” says Mellor. “Our success is due in part to the way our individual experiences complement each other.”

Travis Price emphasizes innovative Modernism together with an understanding of ecological impact and cultural influences. His award-winning firm, Travis Price Architects, offers an international portfolio spanning private residences, offices, retail buildings and institutional landmarks. “Our philosophy focuses on cost-effective Modernism,” Price explains. “We look for three key ingredients: natural surroundings and the art of sustainability; the cultural stories behind the clients and their settings; and humanistic, authentic 21st-century design.”

Much of Price’s work is located in urban areas—often in historic districts. However, his design aesthetic is decidedly modern and his goal is to advance DC’s design vernacular into a sophisticated 21st-century idiom; for instance, a home he designed in the historic neighborhood of Cleveland Park reflects a Modernist style even as it melds with the surrounding older homes.

Price, who teaches at Catholic University, co-sponsors and develops student design/build expeditions to countries ranging from Nepal to Peru. He often gives lectures on his work and the state of architecture at the National Building Museum, the Smithsonian Institution and the National Geographic Society. Among other publications, his projects have appeared in House Beautiful, The New York Times and Architectural Record. His firm has received numerous Washington AIA design awards.

Award-winning Rill Architects has been designing custom homes and additions with a focus on environmental consciousness since 1987. The firm’s projects range from $100,000 to $10 million. “We incorporate natural light and utilize the entire site to expand homes into the landscape,” James Rill says.

Rill Architects uses a 3-D technique that accurately depicts a home’s final design early in the process, thereby minimizing changes that add cost. Rill is involved from the beginning to the end of the design and construction phases, listening to the homeowners’ wishes and guiding them through the complex building process. “We realize that we as architects are just visitors to the home and site; our clients are the ones living there,” Rill explains.

Rill cultivates a team spirit amongst his colleagues by insisting that everyone be involved in the business. The team includes architects Linda Gallegos, Kay Kim, James Murray, Richard Rossi and David Benton and office manager Tom DiMisa. Rill Architects’ work has received recognition via published articles and awards totaling more than 200. Among recent accolades, the firm was recognized in SmartCEO magazine’s Eco CEO awards and Trends magazine’s Top American Homes.

Ernesto Santalla, architect and principal of Studio Santalla, combines architecture and interior design in his practice. “I approach design as an entity that incorporates architecture, interior design and engineering,” he says. “It’s that holistic approach that creates meaningful and long-lasting work.”

Studio Santalla offers both architectural and interior design services—with seamless results. Born in Cuba, Santalla has lived and studied in Latin America, Europe and the U.S. “I think of myself as a design professional, not specifically as an architect or interior designer,” he observes. “A broad world view and diverse professional experience allow me to offer my clients a comprehensive approach to design.”

During a recent project, Santalla redesigned a loft apartment on 14th Street in DC that exceeded expectations. “The design fits the space so well it appears as if we did nothing,” he explains. The same project also demonstrated his ability to collaborate with clients, establishing a rapport that fosters mutual trust and clear communication of goals and expectations and enables him to deliver high-quality results.

In addition to regional and national coverage, Studio Santalla’s work has reached new audiences through publications in Colombia, Brazil, Poland and Turkey. In 2014, Santalla was honored to appear on “Hispanic Agenda,” the only bilingual news show in the Washington area.

Stephen Shum’s interest in design began when he was a small boy working with Legos. “The reward of creating an object in the mind and then realizing it through my own hands became something I continue to chase every day,” says the designer, who is now principal of his own firm, workshop11. Today, Shum focuses on combining contemporary design with sensible building techniques, creating a modern alternative to the traditional.

Shum stresses that honesty and trust are the most important factors in the client-designer relationship. “By working closely with the client through all stages of the project from conception to completion, a strong sense of ownership is developed by both the client and the designer,” he says. “The result is a home that everyone can be proud of.”

During the early years of his career, Shum worked as a carpenter, as well as designing custom furniture and installations. Drawing from this experience helps him conceive novel, creative solutions for his clients. “Often a client will have a preconceived idea of what they believe they would like,” he explains. “It is our job, designer and client together, to explore and challenge those ideas. Through this process it is possible to end up with a new understanding of what is appropriate for the project.”

Founded in 1995, Custom Design Concepts focuses solely on designing custom homes in the Washington, DC, area. Residential architecture projects are as individual as the clients themselves, and the firm creates a fresh, innovative design for each new project. “A successful custom home responds to its surroundings sensitively, meets the owner’s requirements completely and achieves aesthetic excellence,” says principal Mark Sullenberger. “This kind of success can only come from a cooperative relationship between the owner, the architect and the construction contractor; there should be a healthy exchange of ideas and inspiration bound together in a relationship of mutual respect and trust.”

Sullenberger and his team treat the process of designing and building a custom home as one of artistic creation that should not be rushed—regardless of technology that can streamline the process. “Time is a necessary element in the formation and development of quality ideas and designs,” he observes.

When the design team achieves its goals, the completed home will be natural in its surroundings and comfortable for the owner to live in. “A well-designed home can actually reduce stress through its comfort, functionality and sense of security,” Sullenberger explains. “At Custom Design Concepts, we understand the importance of home.”

Grounded in architectural history, a sense of place and professional rigor, Merle Thorpe Architects fosters collaborative relationships so clients can realize their vision of how they wish to live. “We blend traditional and modern idioms and materials to invigorate new design while meeting our clients’ program and budget requirements,” says principal Merle Thorpe. “Achieving reciprocity between the house and landscape animates all our work.”

Since childhood, Thorpe has been an avid student of both science and art. Those passions, along with a family that encouraged curiosity, a love of travel and appreciation of other cultures, fueled his interest in architecture early on.

When embarking on a project, Thorpe balances his clients’ directives with the site’s context and environment, as he and his project architect Patrick Cooke did on the project, pictured here, with client/interior designer Martha Vicas. “I understand how and why the regional vernacular adapts to the climate, the landscape and the neighborhood,” explains the architect, who especially enjoys challenges posed by projects on the Eastern Shore, where environmental factors and regulations come into play.

Thorpe has received many awards, including an Award of Excellence from the Washington Chapter of the AIA. But the greatest rewards, he says, are pleased clients who see their home as “an inevitable extension of themselves and its place.”

The major renovation of a Cleveland Park Four Square illustrates the firm’s adept blending of traditional and new architectural styles. A new kitchen, the largest room in the house, serves as a pivotal center of home, loggia and garden. Carefully proportioned and aligned openings delineate an enfilade of rooms, bringing cohesion from front to back through new and old. A sedum roof, pocketing insect curtain, ceiling fans and fireplace extend the use of the covered loggia to three seasons.
Treacy & Eagleburger Architects is a small, DC-based firm that has been designing award-winning, single-family residences up and down the Atlantic coast for 25 years. The husband-and-wife team of Jane Treacy and Phil Eagleburger subscribes to a three-step philosophy of listening carefully to the client’s wishes; studying the site to identify and draw upon its strengths; and bringing experience and ideas that enhance the creation of a great design.

The strength behind the partnership of Treacy and Eagleburger lies in their agility with the following factors: project size (from a single room to an estate); project context (from rural to urban); and project style (from traditional to modern). “We work within the client’s selected style rather than being tethered to a style of our own,” Treacy says. “Our firm implements smart planning, site-specific improvisation, art and whimsy.”

According to Eagleburger, years of experience in the same market, gaining jobs via word-of-mouth and a long list of repeat clients, set his firm apart. “We are committed to accurate simulation through examples and three-dimensional modeling, rather than the selling of an idea,” he says. “Architecture depends upon the fusion of art and practical necessity. It’s this fusion that has inspired Treacy & Eagleburger Architects over the years.”

Architect Ben Van Dusen agrees with musician John Zorn that “home is a device for inspiring creativity.” As principal of Van Dusen Architects, he says his goal is to create “a place of refuge and peace that is reflective of the client’s program for living.”

Van Dusen has been involved in building things since his early years, when he assisted his father, an amateur furniture maker. Later, he trained as a restoration carpenter in New Orleans. “This experience profoundly impacted my approach to architectural design, creating a deep appreciation for the building arts,” he explains. “Renovating two of my own homes in Washington, DC, has also provided an ideal opportunity to experiment and test design ideas.” One of his firm’s recent projects was the restoration and adaptive reuse of a large 1881 landmark mansion on Dupont Circle, with a new mixed-use annex rendered in glass and steel built by its side. “This was, in many ways, a dream project,” he says, “since it combined restoration and new construction and Victorian and modern styles in a dense urban context.

“The hallmark of a successful project,” Van Dusen concludes, “is a happy and self-assured client, and a built product that is finely crafted, sensitive to its environmental impact and responsive to its site.”

Wentworth, Inc., offers a unique collaboration among architects, designers and craftsmen who integrate architecture, interiors and construction to create timeless, award-winning homes. Based on more than 25 years of design/build experience where homeowners’ functional and aesthetic needs for their remodeling projects always come first, Bruce Wentworth, AIA, believes livability and beauty are essential to every design endeavor.

Exposure to the Prairie-style homes of Frank Lloyd Wright first inspired Wentworth to become an architect. “Transforming my architecture practice into a design/build firm in the 1990s is one of my proudest moments,” Wentworth says. “I am able to offer clients the added benefits of an integrated system.”

Wentworth asks clients to prepare an “idea book” that contains images of what they like. This provides the foundation for each project. “We present several design options before moving forward,” Wentworth says. “We provide daily progress updates during the process to address any concerns that may arise.”

Wentworth, Inc.’s accolades include the 2013 Home & Design Designers’ Choice Award for Favorite Design/Build Firm; Professional Remodeler magazine’s 2013 Silver Design Award for Residential Interior Under $100,000; and the 2013 Qualified Remodeler Magazine Bronze Master Design Award for Room Remodel. ARCHITECTURE

Gregory Wiedemann, AIA

WIEDEMANN ARCHITECTS LLC

With more than 30 years of experience, Wiedemann Architects LLC is an award-winning residential firm whose commissions include large estates, historic restorations and sympathetic additions to homes throughout the mid-Atlantic region.

Wiedemann Architects’ designs, regardless of style, reflect attention to detail and fit seamlessly into their surroundings; they are also sensitive to the uniqueness of each site and the client’s lifestyle. Principal Gregory Wiedemann, who studied architecture at Harvard Graduate School of Design, is personally involved in each commission and maintains direct contact with each client throughout the design process. He often starts by asking clients to describe their memories of home. “Sometimes it is nostalgic, sometimes it is a reaction to a home that they have owned and sometimes it is a sensibility that makes them at home,” explains Wiedemann. “We strive to find that place and create new memories of home for them and their families.”

The eight-person firm has won more than 100 design awards, including those from the American Institute of Architects and several historical societies. The firm’s work has been featured in numerous publications, including Home & Design, Better Homes and Gardens, Southern Living, Remodeling, Period Homes and Chesapeake Home. Its work has also been featured on HGTV and was recently included in Small Homes by Taunton Press.

Anthony and Elizabeth Wilder lead the talented AWDB staff in creating custom architecture with artful flair. With over 35 years of experience, the firm specializes in custom homes, remodeling, interior design and landscaping. “We capture the essence of what makes a client distinctive,” says Anthony Wilder. “Delivering the perfect design is a cornerstone of our process.”

The firm’s motto, “architecture with whimsy,” reflects its goal of making every project special. “‘Whimsy’ as best described by Bob Goff is ‘the idea that life could be magical and extraordinary if we were only willing to take a few risks,’” says Wilder.

AWDB ensures that design and construction are united in form and function. Each project is assigned its own team of professionals, which includes an architect, interior designer, project manager and lead carpenter who guide clients seamlessly through every phase of the project.

“Great architecture begins with great client relationships,” Wilder observes. “We have a culture of caring, integrity and responsibility.”

Anthony Wilder Design/Build has received numerous regional and national awards. Projects have been featured in House Beautiful, Traditional Home, Good Morning America, HGTV’s “Curb Appeal” and more.

INTERIOR DESIGN
J. Abel Interiors, Ltd., is a full-service design firm specializing in luxurious and livable interiors. Led by board-certified interior designer Jana Abel, this boutique firm creates timeless, elegant spaces that always reflect the client’s lifestyle.

Jana Abel personally manages every project, from the initial client meeting through completion. “Each client is unique and has his or her own personal needs,” Abel says. “I read my clients and pull out their own personal style to create a space that fully represents their individuality.” Abel collaborates closely with her clients, from programming space to reviewing sketches and working drawings, to presenting the finishes and furnishings. “Chemistry between designer and client is crucial,” she says.

Services provided by J. Abel Interiors, Ltd., include architectural interior design, space planning, lighting design, custom furniture and millwork design, custom upholstery, construction management, in-house furniture procurement, paint color selections, accessories, art and antiques.

Abel was raised in Miami Beach and Westchester County, New York, where she “gained an appreciation for both historic and modern architecture” that allows her to design a vast array of projects. Abel began almost 20 years ago designing corporate interiors in the DC area before she transitioned into residential interiors.

Lisa Adams, the principal of Adams Design, Inc., grew up in Manhattan where, as she describes it, “the exterior envelope of an apartment is fixed.” As a result, she was fascinated by interiors and “how changes in interior partitions could transform a space and create a new environment.”

Today, Adams spearheads an interior design firm that provides a full range of space planning and design services. They pride themselves on working closely with clients to develop innovative, effective, functional and aesthetic designs. “From the first meeting to the final site visit, creativity, efficiency, attention to detail and high standards drive every project,” Adams says. “A successful design must be highly functional. We make a strong commitment to understanding our clients, their needs and wishes.”

Lisa Adams has studied interior design and is licensed in the District of Columbia. She has taught both graduate and undergraduate students of interior design. She has an MBA and, prior to becoming an interior designer, worked as a consultant in the business world. “Both fields involve problem solving and finding creative solutions that resolve client constraints,” Adams observes. “Our designs are versatile and we strive to ensure that they will work for our clients now and in the future.”
During the recent design of a contemporary house, Adams created rooms that are distinctive and complementary. A library boasts warm, wood built-ins and comfortable seating (opposite, top). A live-edge dining room table (opposite, bottom) seats more than 16; it is illuminated by a custom Venetian glass chandelier. Lisa Bartolomei practiced commercial interior design for 10 years before transitioning to residential interiors. A desire to make an impact on individuals’ lives led her to create her residential firm, Bartolomei & Co., in 1986; she has been helping people find happiness in their homes ever since.

What sets Bartolomei apart is her ability to work comfortably in any style, from the cleanest contemporary to the most traditional. “I strive to create an atmosphere that is unique, with an emphasis on comfort, usability and, of course, beauty,” she says. To this end, Bartolomei often creates custom furniture and refines the interior architecture in her projects. “Ultimately, I feel that a successful project truly reflects the client,” she explains. “It should look as if they have been collecting things over a lifetime.”

Bartolomei travels extensively, with frequent stops in Paris and New York in search of unique furnishings and artwork. Though based in DC, she studied design in Europe and has completed projects in Jordan, Paris, Florida, Bermuda, New York City, the Hamptons and San Francisco. Her work has been featured in numerous publications, including Interior Design, The Washington Post and Home & Design. She has appeared on “Good Morning America” and ABC News.

Melissa Broffman subscribes to the “less is more” philosophy in her design work. Her classically detailed interiors employ quality materials and layers of light to personalize each space. “My straightforward approach helps me create spaces that answer my clients’ needs and speak to what they find beautiful,” Broffman says. “I’m inspired by the narrative of how they live at home.”

Broffman started out in a job at CNN, where she spent a decade honing her skills at multi-tasking, meeting deadlines and mastering details. She then went back to school, earning a degree in interior design—a field in which, she says, those skills are constantly in use. “My job now is different every day and full of unexpected challenges, much like broadcast news,” she says. “Nearly 13 years after starting my firm, I approach each new project as an adventure. I’ve never looked back.”

To implement design plans, Broffman turns to long-time relationships with manufacturers and tradespeople. From initial consultation to final installation, she intuitively guides clients through matters of form and function while emphasizing quality, value and personal style. “Whether the goal is traditional, eclectic, transitional or modern,” Broffman says, “I instill a space with character, comfort and timeless appeal. Helping clients make informed decisions is all the inspiration I need.”

GREAT FALLS DISTINCTIVE INTERIORS, INC.

Alice Busch grew up overseas and her son, Lucas Trunnell, has spent time living abroad. So it is only fitting that today the designers, both principals at Great Falls Distinctive Interiors Inc., embrace a European sensibility when it comes to their work. Busch and Trunnell take pride in offering their clients finely crafted designs with an emphasis on quality and individual service.

“We carefully listen to our clients’ wants and needs,” Trunnell explains. “Their satisfaction is paramount.”

Inspired by European traditions and their travels abroad, the designers are known for their eye for detail, working with proportion, scale and intricate fabric combinations to create unique interiors. On a recent project in Great Falls, Virginia, Busch and Trunnell sourced imported limestone, vintage wood beams and a varied fabric collection to create a rustic, Tuscan-style family home that is both elegant and inviting.

The designers strive to “value engineer” every project, delivering the best possible outcome within every budget. Early in the process, they ask clients to describe their “ideal refuge.” A careful discovery process ensues as they review their own portfolio projects as well as magazine spreads with clients to develop an innate understanding of their style and preferred color palette.

Says Busch, “We enjoy making beautiful spaces our clients fall in love with. They trust us to turn their dreams into reality.”

SCW Interiors is a full-service design firm specializing in innovative and distinctive spaces that incorporate signature elements for each client. From a project’s inception to completion, SCW works closely with its clients to create a unique design tailored to fit the client’s lifestyle and to reflect their personal taste.

Located in the Washington, DC, region, SCW services a wide geographic area and works with both residential and commercial clients. Detailed construction and design documentation is provided for each project—from new construction to renovation—to facilitate space planning and interior architecture and furnishings. SCW provides project coordination and management, drawing from extensive design resources.

The firm also draws on owner and lead designer Shazalynn Cavin-Winfrey’s unique background in the culinary arts to provide full-service kitchen and bath design. A partnership with Christiana Cabinetry makes private-label cabinetry available to clients.

With a lifelong passion for design, Cavin-Winfrey brings nearly 20 years of professional experience in the industry to her work. A native of the Southwest, she studied at the University of Texas, the Culinary Institute of America and Parsons School of Design. She draws on her background and experiences as a wife and mother of two to create exceptional designs that incorporate both beauty and function.

Over the course of 28 years, David Anthony Chenault has transformed many area homes and restaurants. As principal of the interior design firm D2-decorium design (and co-owner of Decorium Gift & Home with partner and principal Jeffrey Albert), Chenault creates fresh, timeless spaces. “Good interior design is about architecture, transition, comfort and movement through a space,” he says. “With these elements, one can achieve a design that will withstand all trends.”

All projects begin with the client’s lifestyle and vision for their home, then build on their ideas with layers of supporting detail. D2-decorium design can take on any size project and budget. In addition to local sites, Chenault has worked in California, Texas, Missouri, Maine, Delaware, Pennsylvania and Florida. “We want our homes to reflect the client’s lifestyle, not a fancy trend,” he says. “Homes should emanate personality and warmth, and be comfortable and livable while retaining a certain formality.”

David Anthony Chenault is one of Alexandria’s most sought-after designers. Although his work tends toward the traditional, he often takes a more modern approach by combining pieces from different periods for a fresh look and a lived-in, collected style. His work has been published in Christie’s Great Estates, Home & Design, Washingtonian, Northern Virginia, Architectural Digest and 417.

Interior Magic Design is characterized by a friendly, collaborative working technique that stems from the principals, who are a mother-daughter team. “Our ability to work together as ‘family’ shines through to our clients,” says Christmas. “With over 15 years of experience, we bring a multi-generational and diverse perspective to each project. Our focus is on creating beautiful and functional entertaining and family spaces.”

Interior Magic Design’s philosophy is simple: to create living spaces that reflect the unique characteristics and lifestyles of the client, be they young professionals or a family of four. “It’s our goal to make every client a part of the design process,” Woodward says. She and her mother work together to show clients how to feature treasured family heirlooms while mixing in bold patterns and fun textures to create cohesive, personalized environments. They fuse traditional pieces with more transitional design elements for a comfortable, classic and tailored end product.

“Nothing is more rewarding than helping someone bring out the light and happiness in their home,” says Christmas. “Having a positive influence on a client and watching their transformation throughout the design process is the only motivation needed to be a great designer and enjoy working every day.”

Nancy Colbert, the owner and principal of Design Partners, LLC, strives to create stylish and functional interiors that mirror her clients’ personal taste. She and her staff keep up with current styles, trends and available product lines. “This allows us to create personalized, contemporary spaces that fuse classic design elements with modern details,” Colbert says.

After more than 25 years in the design field, Colbert has developed close relationships with vendors, contractors and manufacturers. Design Partners, LLC, collaborates with its team of talented craftsmen to deliver well maintained and managed projects from start to finish.

Nancy Colbert has been a member of the ASID Washington Metro Chapter’s Continuing Education Committee for many years. “A degree is just the beginning,” she says. “Staying current with today’s technology is crucial to our profession.” Her knowledge-based design approach helps her to produce the refined and polished look that her clients have come to expect, with high-quality, detail-oriented results.

Colbert is NCIDQ-certified and licensed in Virginia, Maryland and the District of Columbia. An award-winning designer, she has twice been voted one of the Metro area’s top designers by Washingtonian.

Scott Cooke

SCOTT COOKE DESIGN, LLC

Visits to his grandfather’s Frank Lloyd Wright-designed home first inspired Scott Cooke to become a designer. “My aesthetic was influenced by the dramatic expanses of glass, soaring ceiling heights and use of raw materials,” he says. “They inspired a dedication to quality, and a focus on clean lines, form and materials.”

When embarking on a project, Cooke first finds out how the client lives: What are his or her habits, preferences and aversions? Chemistry is important, and a similar aesthetic is also a major component. “I wind up becoming friends with many of my clients and I think friendship is as important a factor as anything,” Cooke comments. “A successful project will convey the client’s personality and resonate on an emotional level. It will be a comfortable haven in which to recharge.”

Interior design is the third career for Cooke, who worked previously as a fashion design assistant and then as the owner of a landscape company before returning to school to earn a BFA in interior design and launch his own firm. “All of my knowledge and experience informs me,” he observes. “I’m very lucky to have had two other ‘lives’ in addition to this one.”

Scott Cooke Design, LLC, won the Super Service Award from Angie’s List in 2013 for having 100 percent positive reviews. He was nominated as a 2014 “Rising Star” in interior design by Fashion Group International.
In a pre-war Kalorama building, a clean, elegant aesthetic enhances a small bath (above and below) where a large mirror and extended marble countertops make the room feel larger than it actually is. Cooke, who was tapped to design the lower-level dining room (opposite) of the 2013 DC Design House, blended eclectic period elements, quiet abstract art and a bold, hand-painted sisal rug that echoed the shape of the tray ceiling. The effect was both functional and elegant.
Founding partners Courtney Cox and Alex Deringer thrive on teamwork and ideas, specializing in beautiful, transitional spaces that juxtapose old and new, casual and formal, elegant and practical. This approach forms the cornerstone of 2 Ivy Lane’s aesthetic.

“We work with clients to develop warm, soulful and comfortable yet sophisticated interiors,” says Cox. Formerly the owner of Hysteria, a boutique in Alexandria, she finds that “fashion sense is telling about how one will want their interiors to look.”

Deringer is formally trained, having studied interior design at the Corcoran College of Art and Design. “I understand the formal and basic principles,” she explains. “Creating an architectural connection to furnishings and having great lighting are key.”

Cox and Deringer encourage clients to show what inspires them, often through digital mood boards like Pinterest or Houzz, where they ask them to ‘pin’ artwork, interiors, flowers, couture and more. The designers then present their own mix of fabrics, wallpaper and so forth; these items are the starting point for their design.

2 Ivy Lane recently transformed a house in McLean that lacked the desired warmth and character. “By using vivid color, good lighting and refined textures, we turned generic spaces into a sophisticated yet approachable family home,” says Cox. “We created rooms that we’d be proud to showcase in our own homes.”

Founded in 1979, Interior Concepts, Inc., designs a broad spectrum of projects, from well-appointed family homes, beach houses, mountain retreats, large flats and prestigious estates to corporate headquarters, world-class golf clubhouses and international hotels and embassies. ICI has worked throughout the United States and across the globe.

“It is our goal not only to meet our clients’ expectations but to exceed them,” says principal Arlene Critzos. “Our true strength lies in how we approach each project, with systematic order. We never begin a project without totally understanding the client’s needs, their budgetary and quality expectations and timing.” She adds, “This is the most important phase of the project. If you and your client have the same expectations, the end result will always be positive.” Critzos has developed this philosophy over 30 years of referrals; her design vision developed originally out of what she terms “my global experience of living, studying and traveling overseas,” which has broadened her scope and vision.

Critzos and colleague Courtney Griffin emphasize creativity and professionalism in their work. Interior Concepts, Inc., has recently appeared in Better Homes and Gardens, Chesapeake Home + Living, Dream Kitchens & Baths, Luxe and Home & Design.

A trip to Europe during college led Wendy Danziger down the path toward design: Visiting museums and studying cultures and artifacts in Paris and Rome sparked an underlying, lifelong passion for the field.

Now, Danziger is the principal of Bethesda, Maryland-based Danziger Design. She and her assistant, Mary Biletnikoff, design residential and office projects both large and small throughout the region. “We ascribe to the three Cs of design—creativity, communication and caring—to make each client feel special,” Danziger says. “My intention is for projects to flow as tastefully as possible without allowing my ego to interfere. Being creative and offering new and different details can happen at any price point. The key is to be able to tailor these to the prescribed budget.”

In order to identify a client’s preferences, Danziger takes an inventory of his or her belongings. “Even one memento can be what jumpstarts the process,” she says. She asks questions and encourages clients to look at websites such as Houzz and Pinterest to pinpoint their likes and dislikes.

“A successful project stays within budget,” Danziger observes. “It offers a positive outcome in which spaces are used as intended, combining all the elements of good design: Balanced color palette, materials and millwork; beautiful, durable fabrics; and outstanding lighting.”

Barry Dixon

BARRY DIXON INC.

Barry Dixon spent his childhood moving from country to country as the son of an executive with a multi-national corporation. Looking back, he says, it was the constant “reimagining” of his family’s interiors that inspired him to become a designer. “Each time we moved, the new layering of ‘acquisitions’ from our previous experience fascinated me,” he recalls.

Today as principal of Barry Dixon Inc., the designer is adept at layering furniture, textiles, art and accessories to instill his clients’ homes with a worldly—and timeless—sensibility. “We start ‘fresh’ with each approach and refrain from promoting a signature style,” explains Dixon. “Our goal is to create bespoke, tailored interiors that fit the client, the home and the surrounding environment.”

Dixon finds inspiration in the world around him and also from his clients’ own aesthetic. “I find out what they’ve liked and haven’t liked in their previous residences,” he says. “In addition, I look at the colors they wear. Just as in couture, a homeowner should feel natural and comfortable in a space.”

Dixon has created original furniture designs for Tomlinson/Erwin-Lambeth and Arteriors; fabric collections for Vervain; and a paint line for C2 Paint. His work has been widely published in national magazines and also in the books Barry Dixon Interiors, Barry Dixon Inspirations and Fortuny Interiors.

Drysdale Design Associates is a full-service residential interior architecture and design firm that implements projects ranging from simple decoration to complex renovations. Founder Mary Douglas Drysdale is known for an original and timeless style that seamlessly bridges traditional and modern aesthetics. She and her staff are trained in architectural and interior design, with technical knowledge of kitchen and bath design and millwork.

“We are based on the concept of one-stop shopping,” Drysdale explains. “We welcome projects both big and small, and routinely design kitchens and baths, as well as living and dining rooms, libraries, bedrooms and family rooms.”

Drysdale, who is the lead designer on every project, puts a premium on absolute honesty and respect in the client-designer relationship. “Clients who hold back or are disinclined to provide a budget only make the project more difficult,” she says. “I communicate with my clients often and raise every issue that comes up.”

Mary Drysdale received a 2014 NKBA award for large bath and one for mid-sized kitchen in 2013. She was a member of the Design Leadership Summit in 2014, a winner of the 2014 Andrew Martin International Designer of the Year contest, and appeared on Luxe magazine’s 2014 Gold List. Her work has been published in Architectural Digest, House Beautiful, Veranda, and Traditional Home, as well as in Home & Design and Luxe.

The details are what make an interior space visually memorable and express a quality of completeness. In a dining room (opposite), dressmaker detail on the chairs conveys a relaxed look while adding interest; an unusual ceramic piece plays off the striped wall behind it (top); an upholstered banquette provides a comfortable perch in the kitchen (above); and a quiet background was key in a room where strong graphic art was the focal point (left).
Drysdale was inspired by her clients’ collection of sepia-toned photographs to paint the walls of an entry (these pages) taupe. She enlivened the neutral hue with a crisp white table skirt and accessories.
In a master bedroom (these pages), a light-hued chest of drawers is both functional and highly decorative. It’s flanked by Louis XV chairs, armless and upholstered in an eye-catching animal print. Paneling gives the wall detail.
When creating a transitional library, Drysdale embraced a gray palette for a comfortable, welcoming effect; contemporary artwork plays off of traditional millwork and furniture.
Drysdale used a dark tone for the shelves and walls in a library that contained a lot of dark-covered books (these pages). Decorative items on the shelves add interest.
“Interior design can be overwhelming if you don’t have the experience or resources to achieve the character and quality you desire for your home,” says Joanne Fitzgerald, principal of Gätéga Interior Design. “It’s imperative to develop solutions that work functionally, aesthetically and financially.”

Fitzgerald and her team educate clients on the fundamentals of design, helping them understand their preferences and articulate their responses to what they see. Communication and trust are part of the process. “A successful working relationship depends on both client and designer listening and discussing visions, priorities and fears,” Fitzgerald observes. “A client should feel comfortable giving themselves over to their designer and trust implicitly that they won’t be led astray.”

Fitzgerald has always been interested in architecture and the decorative arts. Early engineering training makes her more technically versed than many of her industry peers. “I have lived and breathed art, design and international culture through travel, which influences my approach to design,” she says.

As Fitzgerald sees it, the hallmark of a successful project is a happy client. “Nothing says ‘good design’ better than people who enjoy their space,” the designer says. “They don’t have to know why they enjoy it; it simply feels good.”

Designing waterfront homes is a specialty of Gina Fitzsimmons, principal of Annapolis-based, full-service design firm Fitzsimmons Design Associates. For more than 20 years, Fitzsimmons has created beautiful spaces for clients on the shores of the Chesapeake, always ensuring that water views take center stage. “It’s important not to detract from the focal point of a waterfront home as you frame the view with the interior furnishings,” she explains.

Fitzsimmons describes her “Chesapeake Cozy” style as “natural, beautiful and tailored yet comfortable, functional, unpretentious and easy-going.” She and her team gather information about the client’s functional needs, aesthetic preferences, budget and time frame through dialog about preferences and priorities. They then customize a style to fit the client’s vision. From presentation to final installation, Fitzsimmons and her team painstakingly study how each piece interacts with the design, making selections that will lead to the best possible results.

Gina Fitzsimmons is a professional member of ASID and is NCIDQ-qualified. She won first place in the 2013 ASID contest for Best Show House Design for The Maryland Green Show Home, and her work was published this year in Chesapeake Home & Living, Annapolis Home, Annapolis Lifestyle, Home & Design and The Baltimore Sun.
Fitzsimmons participated in the 2012 Maryland Green Show House, where she designed a family room/kitchen. Karen Germond

KMD INTERIORS

KMD Interiors focuses on designing and transitioning spaces for those in the midst of lifestyle changes: buying a vacation home, people upsizing or downsizing, empty nesters and retirees. Principal Karen Germond believes that an individual’s style is as unique as his or her fingerprint. “I discover the client’s design ‘fingerprint’ and use it to elevate their space into something extraordinary and unique to them,” she says.

For Germond, designing a space is a multi-step process. “Before I begin, I have my clients select inspirations that we discuss together,” she explains. “They also complete a lifestyle questionnaire to identify concerns like allergies, special needs, etc.” Germond then creates a vision board that reflects their needs and style. By the time she starts a project, she has a deep appreciation for what the final design needs to convey. She also has developed a relationship with her client of communication and trust that ensures his or her needs are considered.

Each project comes with its own set of challenges, from budget and deadlines to availability of materials. “Being able to address these challenges and move forward is probably what I’m most proud of,” Germond says. “I actually net a better result when I’m thinking outside the box to find a solution.” She adds, “When a space resonates for someone, it elevates their well-being. That’s the most important thing a space can do.”

The principal of Susan Gulick Interiors, Susan Gulick has a background in fine arts and more than 20 years of design experience. Whether she is embarking on a whole-house project or refreshing a few rooms for a long-time client, Gulick takes pride in bringing to her work exceptional materials, craftsmanship and an insightful understanding of her clients’ needs.

The award-winning designer’s portfolio reveals a wide range of styles, from modern to traditional. Her goal is to attain a fresh, uncluttered look, as well as a sense that all of the elements in a room are expertly combined to create a balanced, unified whole. “I first start with an array of fabric possibilities,” she says. “They are the nucleus of transforming a house.”

Gulick is adept at achieving consistent design flow from room to room by using color and quality pieces. Her crisp designs employ a mix of her favorite elements—in addition to rich fabrics, she frequently uses custom furniture, hand-loomed carpets and cutting-edge lighting, all energized by striking modern art.

Reflecting on her work, Gulick describes how she marries her signature look with functionality. “I love a look that’s clean, a retreat for soothing relaxation,” she says. “But I’m also a realist. Life is about whirlwind schedules and all kinds of lifestyles. Homes must work. Aesthetics must also yield to practicality.”

PAULA GRACE DESIGNS, INC.

Paula Grace Designs helps busy, accomplished professionals achieve a design for their home that suits their multifaceted needs. “We believe your home should be a place where you feel at peace, where you function effortlessly,” says principal Paula Grace Halewski. “It should portray who you are today, remind you of happy times and provide fertile ground for you to create new memories.”

Prior to studying interior design, Halewski earned graduate degrees in psychology and business administration. These disciplines provided an ideal skill set for her career in design: Her experience as a psychotherapist helps her interpret clients’ wishes, while her MBA helps her run a successful business.

Paula Grace Designs creates luxurious, comfortable homes emphasizing a personalized approach and custom furnishings. First, Halewski gets to know her clients “as people, by talking and asking questions,” she says. She gives them pictures to look at, making notes of what they like and dislike. “It’s like peeling back the layers of an onion to get to the core of what they want their home to say,” observes the designer. “Then I create new layers, consulting with them as I go, to form a cohesive whole.”

She adds, “It’s really an honor to be invited into people’s private worlds. The positive feedback I get from my clients moves me every time.”

Syntha Harris-Wendel is an award-winning designer and the founder of Storybook Rooms, LLC, a residential interior design firm. SBR creates luxurious, timeless and livable spaces that are infused with traditional warmth and original ideas. The firm’s approach is to connect people with place in a beautiful home environment that personally reflects its occupants.

Harris-Wendel believes that true collaboration between client and designer and an open line of communication ensure a healthy and successful project. “In order to help my clients articulate their desired look,” the designer says, “I use images and other visual aids to identify their style. Pictures serve as a common language and allow me to evaluate the client’s taste.”

Previously a model in European and American fashion houses, Harris-Wendel was inspired by designers such as Oscar de la Renta, Ralph Lauren and Mary McFadden to bring what she learned in the fashion industry into the home environment. “Fashion is continually influencing home styles and trends,” Harris-Wendel explains. “Working directly with icons of the fashion world, I learned the art of layering and mixing colors with patterns—all of which I incorporate into my interior designs.

“A successfully designed home has continuity and a harmonious flow,” she continues. “It is a reflection of its inhabitants.”

Barbara Hawthorn’s career has been informed by life experience. Growing up in New York, Los Angeles, London and Paris exposed her to the best in design, architecture and the arts. Working in her father’s engineering firm taught her technical drafting skills and about alternative energy sources. A background as an artist instilled an understanding of color, light and composition.

“Good taste is about quality, value and knowledge—with a nod to the classics and an eye to what is fresh and ‘today,’” observes Hawthorn. “Meeting the client’s aspirations inspires us to create original spaces providing lasting value with comfort and durability. Functional opulence is our mantra as we strive for perfection.”

At the start of each project, Hawthorn interviews the client to determine budget parameters and help them discover their personal style. “We use a systematic, organized approach,” she explains. “At completion, our clients often say, ‘You gave us more than we hoped for and made it easy.’”

Barbara Hawthorn was named Hall of Fame Designer by Home & Design in 2009; one of DC’s best designers by Washingtonian in 2009, 2010 and 2011; and Professional Woman of the Year 2011-2012 by the National Association of Professional Women. Her work has appeared in numerous national and local publications.

Creating a beautiful, functional home environment is a personal journey, and Andrea Houck is honored when clients invite her into their homes to help guide that process. In Houck’s design projects, the client’s personality and style—whether traditional, modern or somewhere in between—come through.

Possessed with an innate sense of color, scale, balance and rhythm, Houck can envision how a finished space will look before beginning work and offers clients detailed presentations and a careful methodology. “I take the time up front to ensure that we all share the same vision,” says Houck.

Houck earned a Bachelor of Fine Arts degree from the University of Tennessee at Knoxville, becoming a designer in 2000. She has been “creating spaces you will love” in the Washington, DC, area for more than 14 years. She is passionate about giving back to the community and has taken part in design-related projects for Habitat for Humanity, the Georgetown Jingle and the Tuckahoe Home & Garden Tour.

Houck’s work has appeared in numerous publications, including Home & Design, The Washington Post, Arlington Magazine, Northern Virginia Magazine and Washington Spaces. She was selected to design the bar and hallway of the 2013 DC Design House and is a professional member of IFDA.
Deborah Houseworth, ASID, NCIDQ

DLH DESIGN STUDIO, LLC

According to designer Deborah Houseworth, function is the most important principle of design. Her firm, DLH Design Studio, is well known for its sensitive approach that draws out the needs of each client, producing timeless spaces unique to the individual. “We stress originality rather than the design trend of the moment,” Houseworth explains. “By combining comfort with classic design principles, we create spaces that are original as well as livable.”

Not only does Houseworth apply creativity and attention to detail to every project, but she and her staff couple these with strong business skills, efficient project management and careful budgeting. With more than 30 years of experience in the industry, Houseworth enjoys a good rapport with the many architects and contractors with whom she has worked.

Houseworth has been listed as a top DC designer in Washingtonian and has received numerous awards from the American Society of Interior Designers, including ASID Medalist—the highest chapter award given for outstanding service and contributions to the body of knowledge that supports the profession of interior design. She has served as president, board member and committee chair for the Washington, DC, chapter of ASID over the past 28 years and has also participated in several area show houses.

Howarth Designs is a boutique design firm creating one-of-a-kind interiors that are comfortable, sophisticated and stylish. Principal Dolly Howarth uses unexpected color palettes, modern-meets-vintage furnishings and high-quality materials in spaces that forgo trends in favor of lasting charm. “I believe a well-designed ‘boutique’ home is an everyday retreat that enriches daily life,” Howarth says. “My clients inspire the foundation of my design concepts and my ideas are built on that premise.”

Reflecting on her previous career as an economist, Howarth says, “Time spent working in an orange burlap cubicle helped me realize the effect of our surroundings on our well-being.” She adds, “To this day I am avenging the inhumanity of that cubicle by creating considerate spaces and instilling in my clients the importance of good design.”

Recently, Howarth redesigned the interior of a 1980s passive solar riverfront home in Virginia where an inherently contemporary sensibility had been obscured by an overload of traditional millwork and furnishings. She preserved elements that were purposeful for solar functioning, then added sustainable materials and classic modern furniture. The result is a weekend house with personality and integrity.

According to Howarth, the design process requires diligence, trust and a sense of humor on the part of both designer and client. Says the designer, “A project is a success when my clients’ home radiates their personality once my work is done.”

Bridget Beari Designs is a full-service interior design firm serving clients from New York to Palm Springs. Owner and founder Susan Jamieson taps into 23 years of experience on projects that infuse her distinct vision with each client’s personal taste, in a way that complements the style of the home. “In order to keep my interior design work interesting, I like to try something new and exciting on every project,” she says. “But I also stay grounded in the core fundamentals that are the hallmark of Bridget Beari Designs.”

Jamieson feels her passion for interior design is what sets her apart. “It helps me connect with my clients on a deeper level,” she explains. “You have to gain the client’s trust of your vision for how a space is going to look and be able to follow through and get a project completed in a professional manner.”

In 2013, Bridget Beari Designs launched its third line of interior paints, Bridget Beari Colors, a palette of 196 hues that is sold both under a private label and by Fine Paints of Europe; in 2014, a line of custom wallpaper and fabrics will be added to the mix. Jamieson participated in the 2013 DC Design House. Her work has appeared in Home & Design, as well as in Traditional Home, House Beautiful, Southern Living and more. Her projects have been featured on HGTV and The Learning Channel.
HAUS INTERIOR DESIGN

Principal Kirsten Anthony Kaplan brings an uncommon professionalism to her interior design projects. With degrees from Dartmouth and Yale, she excels at working with architects, contractors and landscape designers on behalf of the client. “Creative development begins alongside the client,” Kaplan says. “But as the vision coalesces, success depends in large part on the efficient execution of design plans.”

Kaplan started designing in San Francisco 15 years ago, before she moved to the DC area. “One of my most unusual childhood memories is of my mother—a German Bauhaus aficionado—knocking down the walls of our mid-century house to create an open floor plan,” she recalls. “Luckily, my father was a successful builder! I grew up wandering through job sites, an experience that has proven invaluable to clients who are remodeling or embarking on new construction.”

A vast knowledge of architectural influences helps Kaplan interpret a client’s particular vision. She listens to the client and carefully observes the way they live. “Receiving referrals from clients is the ultimate compliment,” she says. “I’m thankful for a business built almost entirely on word-of-mouth from happy clients who’ve worked with me for years.”

Kaplan’s work has appeared in The Washington Post. She has been named Best of Houzz and has been featured in numerous blogs.

Principals Charlene Kennerknecht and Arch Williams of Monarch Design DC have more than 25 years of experience in creating interiors and the architectural elements that enhance them. “We take a holistic approach to a client’s home,” Kennerknecht observes. “We first look at the architectural ‘bones.’ If these are right, then the interiors naturally fall into place.”

Because Monarch Design is bi-coastal—Williams is based in Los Angeles while Kennerknecht is in Virginia—it combines laid-back California style with a traditional East Coast sensibility to create comfortable elegance that clients love. “We’re translators,” says Williams. “We connect what people say they want with what they really want: comfort, livability and beauty.”

The process starts with a dialogue between designer and client. “We look at how they live in their home, what they like and don’t like,” Kennerknecht explains. “We develop a road map for spaces that are uniquely theirs.” She frequently takes local clients out to Los Angeles to see design sources that are not available in the DC area.

Monarch Design DC creates timeless designs that clients appreciate more as years go by. “To look and feel amazing over time is truly the hallmark of great design,” Kennerknecht says. “We receive calls from clients saying, ‘I love spending time in my home, enjoying spaces I never went to. I appreciate how comfortable our home is now.’ There is no better compliment.”

In the hands of Monarch Design, an unusable niche in a master suite became a quiet space for meditation (above), with upholstered walls, a custom sofa and special lighting. In this Vienna home, a contrasting palette and strong lighting enhance a living room (below and opposite) that is stunning both night and day; an over-scaled, Savannah-inspired fireplace and an extensive art collection create visual interest and drama in the space.
Beth Kittrell

KITTRELL INTERIORS INC.

During a recent project, a first-time client exclaimed on seeing a design choice Beth Kittrell made, “How did you know I would love this? I wouldn’t have known I would love this!”

This comment reflects what Kittrell, the principal of Kittrell Interiors Inc., describes as her strength: “my ability to draw out my client’s style and make it come to life.” The designer does this by spending time getting to know the client, their lifestyle and preferences. “It’s crucial that the finished product be an expression of them,” she says. “If it’s important to them, then it’s an important part of the design.”

Kittrell has even started a branch of her business called Heirloom Designs, which offers visits to a client’s home during which Kittrell figures out how “to utilize their keepsakes and personal collections in fun and creative ways”—a way of further imprinting the personality of the client onto the design of their home. With a strong background in art, Kittrell approaches her interiors as she would a painting or sculpture; these mementos become part of her canvas.

Established in 1989, Kittrell Interiors Inc., offers an array of services, including design plans and furnishings; arranging existing furnishings; assisting in builder selections for new home construction; and staging for resale. The company has long-time working relationships with industry professionals that ensure high-quality workmanship on each project.

Sharon Kleinman’s progression into design was a natural one, as she comes from a family of successful architects. Today, Kleinman is passionate about helping clients create their own unique interiors in projects ranging from new construction to major renovations to whole-home makeovers. Whether traditional, transitional or contemporary, her well-edited spaces communicate timeless appeal.

“For more than 18 years, my primary goal has been to create warm, inviting spaces for my clients and to collaborate closely from start to finish,” Kleinman says. “A project is not complete until the last accessory is placed.”

She believes that an interior should not only be admired, but should also be livable, comfortable and speak to a client’s personal style. At the outset of every project, Kleinman works to define her clients’ taste. She often incorporates a homeowner’s hobbies, heirlooms and artwork into the design to create an environment that reflects their lifestyle.

“I want to develop and instill in my clients a sense of confidence in their own style,” she explains, “and craft spaces that are both useful and beautiful.”

Kleinman’s work has been published in Home & Design and in Spectacular Homes of Greater Washington, DC. Kleinman was a participant in the 2012 DC Design House.

Lee Design and Interiors is a full-service design-build firm that is not limited to one style, and that utilizes different disciplines to accomplish the goal of absolute client satisfaction. “We provide all disciplines under one roof,” explains principal Barbara Lee, “so the client can enjoy the process rather than having to chase people around to accomplish the job.”

Barbara Lee grew up in the fashion world, where “the constant bombardment of new styles fostered a desire in me to create something that could outlast trends,” she says. “When I made the move to interior design, I carried that belief with me. Today, I strive to bring timeless style to my projects.”

Barbara and her husband and partner, Chol, put a premium on listening. “When creating someone’s personal space you have to discover what they want and need,” says Chol. “Not what you want to put into the space. We use our expertise to carry out our clients’ dreams, not those of our designers.”

The Lees are most proud of a hotel renovation they took on in South Korea, where Chol is from. “Using our knowledge from the residential sector we handled Hotel Philemo in Gwanyang with a totally different approach,” Barbara recalls. “We created a hotel space that also offered a feeling of home.”
Lee Design and Interiors wears a variety of hats, as the firm’s projects attest. Clockwise from opposite, top: A total home renovation in Northern Virginia boasts a 5,000-square-foot addition with a stucco façade; an Asian-inspired dining room is complete with custom shoji window screens, hardwood floors and furniture; a modern kitchen remodel is light and airy; and a colorful, eclectic home theater is both lively and comfortable.
Victor js Liberatore has been producing award-winning interior design and architectural detailing for more than 30 years. He established his namesake firm in 1981, focusing on contemporary, transitional and eclectic interiors. As he explains it, “Our mission is to educate, entertain and satisfy our clients’ requirements both in living and working environments.” While Liberatore has a select team of people working with him, he’s personally involved in every aspect of a project.

Liberatore’s passion for design was sparked at a young age. It was his maternal grandfather, a fashion designer in Europe, who inspired his career ambitions. “The way he could fashion a clothing garment, just by assessing the client’s size and style, is much like the way we work,” the designer explains.

“It’s from learning their likes, style and preferences that we are able to create spaces that suit our clients. Every project has a distinct evolutionary process, and we define its interiors through its owners.”

Liberatore graduated with honors from the Maryland Institute College of Art with a BFA degree in interior design. He is certified by the National Council for Interior Design Qualification (NCIDQ). He is also a professional member of the American Society of Interior Designers (ASID) and served as a past president of ASID Maryland Chapter.

Though trained as an architect, J. Paul Lobkovich has focused on kitchen design for more than 20 years. His portfolio includes projects in the Washington, DC, area and throughout the U.S.

Lobkovich and his staff of professionally trained and educated designers promote a collaborative work environment. Their approach focuses on clients’ preferences and desires as well as on the relationship of the kitchen to the rest of the home. “We work closely with architects, interior designers and homeowners to design kitchens, provide custom cabinetry and assist with the coordination of other aspects of the project including countertops, appliances, tile flooring and lighting,” says Lobkovich. The company partners with manufacturers of some of the most innovative, environmentally conscious products and appliances on the market today.

Initial interviews take clients’ wishes and concerns into consideration. During a recent project, Lobkovich observed a home cook in action to determine trouble spots in the existing kitchen; he even spent time with the entire family to observe how the space was currently used. The result was a beautiful kitchen with two islands and plenty of room for family activities.

J. Paul Lobkovich was named Hall of Fame Designer in the 2013 Designers’ Choice Awards by Home & Design. His kitchens have been featured on HGTV and in Architectural Digest, Washingtonian, Traditional Home, Home & Design and more.

Jodi Macklin, principal of Jodi Macklin Interior Design, is known for her original approach to texture and color. Her work reflects her clients’ lifestyles with graceful harmony of form and luxurious materials. Along with associate designer Lauren Sparber, she creates functional, easy-to-maintain living environments that are beautiful in isolation and filled with warmth when family and friends are present. “I translate my clients’ vision into livable spaces, from intimate bedrooms to sophisticated living rooms,” Macklin says. “I have always had a love and appreciation for beautifully designed spaces.”

The designer is adept at earning clients’ trust, gaining a thorough understanding of what they’re looking for and managing their expectations throughout the process. “Each project and client offers a unique and different experience,” Macklin observes. “I maintain a constant dialogue with the client to determine what they are in search of and how to combine it with my vision.”

Macklin recently completed a home on Maryland’s Eastern Shore and it is currently the project of which she is most proud. “It was a renovation of a home that is now unrecognizable when compared to its original state,” she says. “The home now reflects the calm, serene feeling of its waterfront setting.”

Dahlia Design embodies sophistication and innovation. This sensibility is reflected in the work of principal Dahlia Mahmood and her staff of craftsmen and designers, who combine the elegant forms of classic architecture with transitional elements to create simple yet glamorous interiors.

“Our dedication to quality and excellence has built trust among high-profile clients nationally and internationally,” says Dahlia, whose firm is based in Ashburn, Virginia, and Los Angeles. “The business of interior design tends to become very personal, so it’s important to be able to communicate your ideas or concerns with one another. Trust is the vital characteristic.”

Dahlia develops a style for a client through careful listening. “Before I start, I ask the client’s likes and dislikes and what they envision for the space,” she says. “I ask about their daily lives and map out a floor plan that flows with the structure of the family. Residential design is much more than decoration; it is creating a lifestyle and a functional space in which the client feels at home.

“Design is a universal concept that binds function and artistic taste seamlessly, and can be understood as beautiful and harmonious by everyone, regardless of personal style,” she continues. “At the end of a project, I am confident when my heart skips a beat, even after seeing the space over and over again.”

Dahlia Design received an NKBA Award of Distinction for Large Kitchen in 2013.

As the principal of Olamar Interiors, Paola McDonald’s design philosophy is simple: “Your home should not only reflect who you are but also the way you live in and use it every day. Luxury is truly enjoying your home and the time you spend in it.”

McDonald creates spaces that “hug you when you enter them,” she says. She layers vibrant colors, fun patterns and interesting textures to impart a sense of identity. “I am inspired by all of the wonderful things that make a house a home,” she says. “My success has been in large part because I don’t accept the words ‘it cannot be done.’ If I can conceive it, I will find a way to make it happen.” This creativity has resulted in unique, personal and tailored design solutions.

At Olamar Interiors, communication is paramount. McDonald listens carefully to her clients, weighing their likes and dislikes, observing their taste and how they use their space. She asks clients to create idea books of spaces that resonate for them. “My job is to help clients define what they want with a beautiful and functional design,” she explains.

The Interior Design Society (IDS) recently awarded McDonald the Designer of the Year Award for Specialty Areas, Children’s Rooms, Playrooms and Nurseries, and a second-place Designer of the Year Award for Living Spaces $30,000 and Under.

A warm, vibrant color scheme is the backdrop for large gatherings in a sleek, elegant dining room (left).
According to designer Lynni Megginson, a successful project implements systems that make sense. “It’s the little details that count,” she explains. “Thinking about the way the space will be used and responding to those needs make all the difference between a mediocre project and a successful one.”

Megginson believes that the home is a “calling card” that should tell the client’s story. Therefore, she asks each client for an inspiring image as a starting point. “Whether it’s a piece of art or the memory of a luxurious hotel room, tapping into the emotion of a client is as important as anything else in the process,” she explains. “We want the room to resonate with them and give them great pleasure when the project is complete.”

As a designer and parent, Megginson takes a practical approach when working with active families. “I really think about how products will wear, how easy they are to clean and maintain and their longevity. We take the extra time to really make sure our selections make sense for the people who will be using them.” She also conducts a budget review during the initial meeting. “Having a realistic budget in place, being respectful of that budget and not exceeding it are essential to the way we do business,” she says. “Our clients love it.”

Sandra Meyers

SANDRA MEYERS DESIGN STUDIO

When she was growing up, Sandra Meyers loved to help her father with projects around the house. “Through those experiences I learned the essentials for building a home from start to finish,” she recalls. To this day, the designer finds the start of a new project exciting. “All I can think about are the challenges and how I’m going to solve them,” she says.

Sandra Meyers Design Studio focuses primarily on residential and light commercial projects. With her educated, trained eye and knowledge and understanding of architecture, scale and proportion, Meyers is able to enhance and bring each client’s unique vision to life.

At the start of a project, she tells homeowners, “This is your home,” in order to make it clear that she is there to help achieve a style that is right for them, be it contemporary or traditional. Once she and the client have discussed their needs, she can suggest changes or additions to make the most impact.

Meyers is adept at blending exquisite fabrics, distinctive furniture and functional floor plans. A case in point is a home she recently designed in Annapolis—a modern take on the Arts and Crafts style—with unexpected details throughout. Meyers received a 2010 “Ones to Watch” award from the Washington Design Center. Her work has appeared in Home & Design, The Washington Post and Washingtonian.

Tracy Morris founded her firm in 2003 and it continues to thrive, with a portfolio that reflects projects in Washington, DC, and Chevy Chase as well as Palm Beach, Florida. Morris, who defines her style as “traditional with an unexpected twist,” has a strong creative vision. “I craft transitional interiors defined by eclectic American chic,” she explains. “In my designs, eras and unexpected materials mix effortlessly and the patina of life shines through.”

Morris emphasizes accessibility in her projects, practicing what she terms “a collaborative ‘we’re in this together’ approach that demystifies the design process” for her clients. “I showcase my clients’ personalities and passions and empower them to look within and create a home that is their own true reflection,” she says. She relies on her intuitive sense of balance and color to give each room an unexpected flavor.

Projects by Tracy Morris have appeared in Home & Design, DC Modern Luxury and a number of other publications. In addition, the design books Black & White by Celerie Kemble and Historic Interiors for the 21st Century by E. Ashley Rooney have featured her work. Morris has participated in the Washington Design Center’s Design House, the National Symphony Orchestra’s Decorator’s Show House and, most recently, the 2014 DC Design House.

As principal of Ambi Design Studio, Shanon Munn focuses on strong communication, trust, honesty and attention to detail. “I have a varied background in commercial architecture, hospitality design, high-end design/build and residential design that helps round out my skill set,” she says. “As a working mother, I am forced to be practical, efficient and decisive in my personal life, which carries over to my design career.”

Ambi Design Studio’s projects reflect its varied clientele. Munn studies existing pieces and inspiration files, conducts interviews, then shows her selections to the client, making sure to include a wild card. “The approach I take is from the inside out,” she says. “I ensure that interior architecture and furniture layouts are absolutely right before I move forward. This creates a road map and a streamlined and coherent result.”

Munn designs custom furniture and relishes solving complicated space plans. “Any project that combines those elements is a perfect challenge for me,” she says. Her designs are clean and balanced but not cold. She observes, “A well-planned design does not need a lot of decoration to give it balance or warmth.”

Ambi Studio’s work has appeared in many publications, including Southern Living, Home & Design and The Washington Post, and the firm’s projects can be viewed on houzz.com. Munn has participated in four major show houses locally over the past seven years.

Haleh Niroo

HALEH DESIGN INC.

During a span of over two decades as an architectural designer, Haleh Niroo has become a trusted voice on creating grand interior and exterior spaces for an elite international clientele. She possesses a precise and intuitive feel for proportion, a refined sensibility for lavish finishes and virtuosity in integrating Old World detailing into projects. Her turnkey programs for magnificent homes speak of restraint and polished elegance while exuding comfort and a sense of welcome.

Haleh’s sensitivity for exquisite and timeless design was shaped and enhanced early by a traditional European education. Later, she expanded on this foundation with extensive international travel and formal design training. Today, she offers firsthand knowledge of and experience with all elements of construction and energy conservation.

On a typical project, Haleh directs a team of architects, interior designers, builders, engineers and artisans, deftly streamlining the design, renovation and construction process. Whether designing an exterior façade, determining the spatial use of an interior, specifying materials and systems for new construction, defining furnishings or adding distinctive decorative elements, her authenticity of vision remains consistent.

Projects by Haleh Design Inc., have been featured in a range of publications, including Luxury Home Quarterly, Bethesda Magazine, Home & Design, Washington Life, Veranda, Traditional Home, Architectural Digest and Robb Report Home & Style, among others. Her work has also been showcased in a number of international design books.

Kristin Peake Interiors is a full-service design firm specializing in high-end residential interiors. Their goal is ultimate client satisfaction. “We believe what sets us apart is the successful integration of our clients’ lifestyle needs and our distinct creative vision,” says owner Kristin Peake. “Whether working on local, national or overseas projects, we transform clients’ interior spaces into the elegant homes they’ve always wanted, orchestrating the entire design process from start to finish, including furniture deliveries and setting up the final layout. It’s truly a concierge experience.”

When Peake meets a potential client, she does a walk-through of their space so they can show her what they like and what they don’t. “I beg them not to tidy up before I come. Even clutter is revealing!” she says. Styles, palettes, furnishings and finishes are client-directed and designer-stamped. “It’s all about collaboration and trust.” She adds, “Design isn’t static. Every day I add inspirational designs to my repertoire, giving them my unique spin.”

Kristin Peake Interiors was founded in 2000. Today, the firm encompasses a team of talented and enthusiastic designers and dedicated office staff. “We strive to create a special bond with all our clients, because our goal is to design safe, livable, beautiful and customized spaces for them and their families,” Peake says. “We take full ownership of our designs, providing every client the utmost in quality workmanship and customer service.”

After earning a degree in interior design, Annette Phillips spent many years designing interiors for model homes before she founded her own design studio, Inspired Design, LLC. “The experience was a fast-paced design lab that gave me the opportunity to work with many styles, scopes and budgets,” she explains. “I learned how to get the most impact for the budget, and where to splurge and where to conserve.”

Today, Phillips creates interiors based on her clients’ priorities, preferences and lifestyles. Using treasured belongings, she tells a story unique to the client, in which every element from the grand gesture to the most personal detail is considered. She emphasizes trust. “The client should honestly give their opinion of presented options,” she says. “It’s helpful if they have a file of things they like, but knowing what they don’t like is also revealing and saves everyone time.”

Phillips is adept at working with builders and architects to make her clients’ dreams a reality. On a recent project, she worked with a builder to design custom niches, transoms and moldings to create a home that evokes a warm, casual elegance.

“My approach starts with the architecture,” Phillips explains, “then I layer details like a painting on canvas until a complete picture forms. Knowing when to stop and leaving some space for air creates the balance.”

ColePrévost’s work has received numerous awards and has been widely published.

Interior designer Michael Roberson took years of drawing and painting classes as a child and young adult, and long dreamed of becoming an artist. Though she eventually pursued a different career path, Roberson views interior design from an artist’s perspective. “My interest lies in ‘painting’ on a larger scale, using a home as a canvas and the world of design resources as a palette,” she explains. “That is what inspired me to become an interior designer.”

The focus of her firm is always the client; Roberson skillfully channels her clients’ lifestyles and preferences into a look that is right for them. “Each project is an opportunity to create an environment unique to that individual, one that functions for their lifestyle and contributes to their emotional well-being,” she says.

Roberson believes her strengths also lie in expertly blending traditional and modern furnishings as well as addressing the importance of lighting—a priority that homeowners often overlook.

An inaugural member of the Washington Design Center’s Hall of Fame, Roberson received a Designer of Distinction award from the Washington Metropolitan chapter of the American Society of Interior Designers. Her work has been published in House Beautiful, Traditional Home, Home & Design, Washingtonian and The Washington Post.

When Margery Wedderburn was a child, her mother, an antiques dealer, frequently took her to interior design and antiques stores throughout the country. Wedderburn began early to develop an eye for design and architectural details—and thus began her love for interior design. After a stint working for a U.S. senator, she obtained a master’s degree in interior design, subsequently working for some of the leaders in the design industry. She launched her own firm in 2000; since then, she has added her touch to countless beautiful spaces—all created with her clients’ lifestyles in mind.

The key to Wedderburn’s perennial success lies in her ability to listen closely to her clients. She and her team then translate and transform their thoughts and ideas into timeless, elegant spaces that reflect their sensibilities and personalities. “We develop a close relationship with our clients and provide a collaboration that includes their initial vision,” she explains. “They are required to do ‘homework’ to convey their likes and dislikes through images. This helps hone in on their style and allows the creative process to begin.”

As Wedderburn observes, “With so much knowledge about the client, their family and lifestyle, the rest is intuition! Success is making sure our clients love the results we have created together.”

Wedderburn added moldings and trim to enliven a living room (below), then selected decorative pieces for visual contrast, like a Lillian August screen that offers a complementary backdrop to antique Asian statues (above). In an Albemarle County, Virginia, home, she commissioned artist Karen Levering to recreate the sweeping views in the foyer (opposite); soft, ethereal colors ensure that the faux painting does not overpower the antique rug and furniture.

Celia Welch Interiors is a full-service residential design firm founded in 1997 with a fresh perspective and a collaborative approach. Since then, principal Celia Welch has built a reputation for design excellence, with projects spread throughout a large geographical area. Her sensibilities are rooted in a love of fine arts, years of experience and an explicit eye for detail.

Welch is comfortable working in both traditional and modern styles. Her goal is to create simple, uncluttered, elegant and timeless designs that transcend the everyday yet truly feel like home. “Over the years, I have witnessed the hectic lifestyles of my clients,” Welch comments. “I therefore try to infuse a spirit of tranquility into each space.”

She also ensures that her rooms reflect the personality of the homeowner. “Each project emphasizes the transition of the client’s unique vision into reality,” Welch says. She stresses the importance of respecting existing architecture, creating a cohesive space and using paint skillfully to create an overall mood.

Projects by Celia Welch have been featured in Home & Design, and twice have appeared on its cover. Her work has been in The Washington Post, and she has been included in Washingtonian’s lists of Top 20 and Top 43 interior designers. Welch participated in the 2010 DC Design House and has several times been part of the Washington Design Center’s Design House.

LANDSCAPE DESIGN
Taking trips along the George Washington Memorial Parkway as a boy inspired Scott Brinitzer to become a landscape architect. “Driving this beautiful, man-made landscape as a child gave me a great appreciation for what could be done with the natural attributes of a site to create a space that is used and loved by millions of people,” he says.

Today, Brinitzer and his staff strive to create outdoor living spaces that clients can enjoy year-round, whether they are in the garden or viewing the landscape from their home. “Creating a strong relationship between home, garden and the larger landscape is most important to us,” he says. He feels that a successful project should convey “a sense of place and understated beauty and encourage a feeling of calm.”

Brinitzer, who fosters a collaborative design process, encourages clients to bring their ideas to the table. “A project makes us proud if it respects the native landscape, adds beauty to someone’s life, contributes to the health of our planet and has a design flair that is classic but with a bit of an edge—something unexpected,” he explains.

The firm has won an Association of Professional Landscape Designers Gold Award, 12 Landscape Contractor Association Grand awards and an Arlington County "Excellence In Design Award."

Barry Schneider and landscape architect Howard Cohen founded Surrounds Landscape Architecture + Construction in 2002 with the mission to create unique, comfortable, site-appropriate and functional outdoor spaces for their clients. In 2006, landscape architect Chad Talton joined the firm.

Today, Surrounds is a unique company comprised not only of landscape architects but also skilled craftsmen such as stonemasons and carpenters. “We collaborate as a team to create award-winning projects while seeking creative solutions to meet every budget,” says Cohen. “Our designs are inspired by the personal style of the homeowner, making each project unique while complementing the character of the home and surrounding landscape.”

With more than 50 years of combined design/build experience, the principals of Surrounds bring a high degree of professionalism and expertise to each job. “All of our projects are evaluated and studied by the entire Surrounds team to ensure that we deliver an outstanding experience for our customers,” says Talton. Recent projects have created one-of-a-kind outdoor amenities, from a thatch-roofed tiki hut to an arbor with a massive stone fireplace.

Surrounds has won grand awards from the Landscape Contractors Association every year since 2002.

As a second-generation landscape designer, Blake Dunlevy has developed a life-long understanding and a familiarity with the possibilities and challenges involved in orchestrating outdoor spaces that clients love. Today, he and Gina Benincasa, principals of D & A Dunlevy Landscapers, Inc., share a passion for plants, Old World-inspired construction and an appreciation for the art that goes into a well-designed space. They both emphasize the importance of good listening and honest communication throughout the design and construction process.

The firm focuses on providing beautiful, creative outdoor spaces that refresh and revitalize clients through the use of plants. “Plants are one of the most under-appreciated resources that humans have. Even more than animals, our relationship to the plant world is as rich and as ancient as our species itself,” explains Dunlevy. “As landscape designers, we can create spaces with the power and ability to awaken people’s connection to the plant world.”

Dunlevy and Benincasa are most proud of a recent DC project, where they transformed a client’s small backyard into a tiny oasis with a plunge pool. The homeowner told them that she enjoys the space every day. “For her, it has become a retreat from all the stresses and strains of life,” says Dunlevy. “For us, that is the biggest ‘win’ of all.”

GRAHAM LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE

Graham Landscape Architecture is an award-winning design studio with thirty years’ experience. The firm’s diverse portfolio includes urban, suburban and rural properties ranging from small oases to large estates. By interweaving land and structure and designing lush gardens, principal Jay Graham and his team create an elegant harmony between indoors and outdoors, artfully blending the client’s story with the land. “My rule of thumb is that as landscape architects we have two clients: the people and the land,” Graham says. “If you are listening to each then the style and palette will emerge organically.”

An undergraduate degree in architecture has been invaluable to Graham, helping him to collaborate with architects and clients on many types of projects. “An open dialog between client and designer is the most important factor,” Graham observes. “The best projects evolve from a flow of ideas and information so that options can be explored and developed, and the most delightful results achieved.”

Graham Landscape Architecture recently earned a grand prize from Annapolis Home for a Cathedral Heights residence. Other accolades include merit awards from AIA DC (shared with Cunningham | Quill Architects) and the Virginia and Maryland chapters of the American Society of Landscape Architects. The Institute for Classical Architecture & Art awarded Graham the Philip Trammell Shutze Award for Landscape/Garden Design: Adaptation of Historic Landscape.

The principals of Lewis Aquatech understand that people live and work in fast-paced environments and need a place to get away from it all. “We provide a space for our clients to relax and truly enjoy an intimate getaway in their own backyards,” says company director Donald Gwizdz. The firm specializes in high-end landscape projects that often focus on dramatic water features—from streams and waterfalls that mimic nature to elaborate pools, fountains and spas.

The most important factor of the process is fostering an open dialogue between the designer and the client. “A lot of clients have an idea of what they want, but don’t know how to express it,” observes Gwizdz. “Open communication allows a client’s thoughts to develop. Their personality and intentions should always be reflected in their outdoor space.”

Recently, Lewis Aquatech designed a 10-acre landscape with six fountains, a 60-foot reflection pool, a custom koi pond, a woodland stream and more. The project exemplified the attention to detail that Gwizdz attributes to a truly successful project. “This is what separates a good design from an exceptional design,” he explains. “The flow of a space, the hand-selected natural materials, the location of joints, the proper plantings—it all creates unforgettable environments.”

“The garden should honor the architectural style of the home as well as the lifestyle and sensibilities of the homeowner,” observes Jennifer G. Horn, principal of Jennifer Horn Landscape Architecture. “My designs are thoughtful and deliberate collaborations between client, architect and the artisans who make them a reality. Every project is unique.”

Horn, who launched her firm in 2009, creates new landscapes as well as garden renovations—which she especially enjoys. “A good designer is a good problem-solver,” she says. “When I need to retrofit an existing site to suit a new family’s needs, I am challenged to be creative and inventive.”

Each project begins with a dialogue between designer and client. “I act as advocate and educator for the client,” Horn says. “Many clients are unfamiliar with landscape design.” To find her clients’ style, she discusses gardens they’ve visited, homes they’ve lived in, and the material selections in their homes, which reflect their aesthetic sensibility. She prefers her projects “not to look overdesigned. If the garden looks like it was always there, then I have done a good job.”

Horn has worked part-time as a college instructor since 2005. She is co-chair of the Residential Professional Practice Network of the American Society of Landscape Architects and a board member of the Washington Mid-Atlantic chapter of the Institute of Classical Arts & Architecture.

Landscape designer Jane Leigh Luce brings 18 years of experience and a lifelong passion as a fine artist to her work with Through The Garden Inc. “I got restless in my studio,” she says, “and just kept wandering out to my garden, so I finally took the hint and started ‘painting’ with all the elements outdoors.”

Luce enjoys working with Through The Garden Inc., because it feels like the more artistic end of the design-build landscape companies. “My clients appreciate that my landscapes seem to become gorgeous 3-D paintings, carefully tailored to become their own personal sanctuaries,” she says.

To achieve this result, Luce pays attention to the choices her clients have made in personalizing their homes, and emphasizes the importance of developing a comfortable, creative partnership with her clients to make sure what she creates really fits them. Luce believes that a successful landscape design should meet the clients’ practical needs, fulfill their sense of how their landscape should feel, and then surpass their imagination with its beauty, grace and artistry.

Luce designed the Zen Garden in the Rooftop Healing Garden at Shady Grove Adventist Hospital and she says this is her proudest achievement “because it continues to touch the lives of so many people.”

McHale Landscape Design, Inc., combines landscape architecture, horticulture knowledge and field experience, using a team management approach throughout to ensure the success of the design/build process. “Our strength is our ability to be the single source for the client,” says Kevin McHale. “Our diverse staff works together to meet the clients’ expectations and budget.”

McHale’s process is interactive and includes the client as an important part of the team. “Our approach is collaborative and affordable,” explains Steve McHale. “We listen to the clients’ needs and dreams, then transform them into functional and beautiful outdoor garden and living spaces.”

McHale Landscape Design, Inc., has received more than 250 Landscape Contractor Association (LCA) awards, 20 National Environmental Improvement Awards and four American Horticulture Society Awards. “Our focus is simple,” says Kevin McHale. “To be the single source for a design/build project from inception to aftercare. Charles Owen

FINE LANDSCAPES, LTD.

Founded in 1978, Fine Landscapes specializes in projects that reflect the clients’ vision and aesthetic and complement the architecture of their homes. The firm’s portfolio includes works in a wide range of styles, from simple projects to complex design/build installations.

“In many cases, we are called on prior to construction to help site a house and its amenities and lay out the overall design of the terrain,” says principal Charles Owen. Fascinated with architecture and horticulture since a young age, Owen visited many of Europe’s most notable parks and gardens as a child growing up in Spain and France. After moving to Washington at the age of 16, he apprenticed with landscape designers—an experience that inspired him to pursue the field as a profession.

Owen has completed a number of high-profile projects in the region. His expertise includes all facets of a project, from horticulture to hardscape, along with outdoor illumination, water works and pavilion design. He continues to study plant species to bring innovation and diversity to his work.

“There’s nothing like hands-on experience,” he says. “Our project managers not only bring varied educational backgrounds, but have performed all aspects of the work themselves. The artisanal knowledge allows managers to better direct the garden art.”

DCA Landscape Architects’ designs are site-responsive, tailoring architectural and planting details to the individual needs or program requirements of clients and their properties. “Our gardens are noted for the strength and clarity of their design,” says principal Guy Williams. “We combine the elements of hardscape such as walls, terraces and pergolas with plantings in innovative ways to create gardens rich in detail and classical elements.”

Williams and his partner, Amy Mills, have worked together for 30 years. Their first project, Merrywood Estate (the childhood home of Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis), helped chart the direction of their firm. “We designed a seven-acre master plan involving hundreds of custom construction details inspired by the dramatic landscape of this property above the Potomac River,” Williams recalls.

Mills and Williams listen carefully to their clients, gleaning information from time spent together with them or on their site. By asking questions and thinking about the context of place, they ascertain what will resonate for each client. DCA also emphasizes the relationship with the craftsmen who will be doing the work. “We see ourselves as collaborators working towards a common goal,” Williams observes. “The finished project should look appropriate in its context, with a balance of proportion and scale, a sense of timelessness, an element of surprise and understated elegance.”
